The praises of the "Men of the Mayflower" who sailed in their frail bark from Plymouth Hoe and dared the unknown wastes of the Atlantic more than three hundred years in search of freedom to worship God, [illegible] said and sung by eloquent lips and [illegible] numbers which have voiced the appreciation of the valorous deed. And well did those heroic pioneers of faith and freedom deserve their meed of praise.

I think it may be truthfully said that the women of the "Colleen Bawn" richly deserve it too, together with their youthful kinsmen, who left the shores of the "silvery Shannon," some hundred and thirty years ago, in an [illegible] unseaworthy craft, driven [illegible] to explore far off lands [illegible] like errand—freedom to worship, accord- [illegible]

[illegible] a lively scene one bright morning in the spring [illegible] little band of rural emigrants from Munster [illegible] neighbors gathered there, the former to embark on board the Colleen Bawn, bound for the New World and the new fortunes which should befall them there; the latter to wish for them with true Irish feeling, a prosperous voyage and cead mille failthe"beyant the say."

The Colleen Bawn was but a small vessel of not more than three hundred tons burden, and as she rose and fell, yawed and listed, even on the but lightly ruffled waters of the Shannon, she gave ominous token of her probable behavior when the angry waves on the heavy swell of the Atlantic billows should deal with her after their own sweet will. Captain O'Connor, the skipper of the Colleen Bawn, was a vigorous, well-seasoned, weather-beaten old salt, whose whole face and figure betokened energy, skill and that confidence in himself which on the whole, expects to weather the storm, however hard the winds may blow.

"It's a long voyage for so small a craft," said the deputy harbor-master, shaking his head and wearing a face that prophesied disaster.

"Sure now, an' there's luck to be got out o' that business, if you know just how to look at it. The smaller the craft the lighter she floats. Be aisy, sor. There's a sound keel beneath her, an' a skipper who knows his business in charge of her, an' God an' the Holy Virgin over her, an' the storm isn't brewed yet that can sink her. The saints be praised there's lashings o' the luck in the Colleen Bawn."

So spake the skipper, and, so speaking, showed full clearly the manner of man he was.

"All right, captain," said the harbor-master, with a short laught; "if any man can take such a cockle shell across the herring-pond, Phelim O'Connor's the man to do it. I know that well enough. Good luck go with you, my hearty."

"There's that going along with you, Captain O'Connor, that's a sight better than luck, and that is the eye and the hand of the Lord God Almighty."

The speaker was a young woman of somewhat striking appearance; taller than the average, erect and slight in form and figure, with face and features at once winsome and commanding; the sort of woman that a stranger turns to take a second look at—first observes, and then admires. She was not to be strictly called beautiful, but she certainly was, to use an expressive word, "taking." Her Teutonic origin was evident in her plentiful hair of light auburn, her broad, but well-defined features, and her uncommonly-expressive dark blue eyes. But probably that which most impressed both Captain O'Connor and the harbor master, as they turned to listen to her strong words, spoken in a voice that had much music in it, was a certain subtle something, not located, but pervasive, which indicated mental power, moral stamina, and spiritual force—the qualities of one who knew her own mind, said what she meant, and meant what she said.

She was simply, but warmly clad in the rough home-spun woollen cloth much favored by the better class of Irish Peasntry of the northwest a hundred years ago; but her somewhat luxurious coils of hair were covered only by a plainly-frilled cap of white linen which hemmed round her pleasant face, and which indicated that, true to her Moravian origin, she did not indulge in the more piquant and assertive headgear which, then as now, was regarded by a certain class of honest Christian people as "pomps and vanities" which it was spiritually wholesome to forego.

'True for you, misthress!" replied Captain O'Connor after he had recovered from the first effect of her vigorous words, words which seemed to him to be almost prophetic in their inspiration and intent, "We'll find the deep say as safe as Limerick harbor if them purty words of yours come thrue. Sure an' 'twill be better than the protection av the saints or aiven the kapin' av the blessed Mary herself, beggin' her pardon." Here the worthy skipper made haste to cross himself, as if second thoughts had suggested that the Virgin Mother might resent the slight.

"They'll come true," said the young woman speaking slowly and with a nod to emphasize the words. "The Lord has many souls on board this ship, and these have been praying night and day for a safe voyage for the Colleen Bawn, and he that holds the winds in his fist and the waters in the hollow of his hand has heard their cry,—the heart-cry of the children whom he has told to say, 'Our Father.'" She spoke reverently, yet with a quiet ease as if she knew all about it and after a moment's pause lifted her speaking eyes to her wondering listener, smiled, and repeated her words, "Yes, they'll come true. 'He is faithful that said it, who also will do it.' They'll come true, as true as that my name is Barbara Heck!"

Captain O'Connor, though not much given to forebodings, felt, as he trod the deck of his little schooner, that she had a firmer floor, and even the dubious harbor-master turned away with a notion that, after all, the frail cockle-shell was like enough to win "the haven whither they would be."

By this time the preparations for the voyage were almost completed. The bales, boxes, and huge bundles of household gear which had been piled upon the quay had all been fitly stowed away. The small crew of rough-looking, weather-tanned sailors were busy here, there, and everywhere, handling chains and ropes, and partly unbending the waiting sails, which gave the Colleen Bawn the appearance of a sea-bird just pruning its wings for flight. The emigrants who were about to leave the motherland, to make for themselves a new home beyond the sea, were gathered in little knots and clusters in different portions of the deck, wore, with but few exceptions, the tokens on their faces of the sore wrench which was about to sever them from home and kindred.

They were evidently emigrants of a superior sort, all decently and warmly clad, the men in knee-breeches, comfortable worsted hose, and frieze coats of the old "swallow-tail" fashion; the women in blue or brown cloaks of homely manufacture, with projecting hood-like bonnets and snowy caps. All of them were likely enough, by all reasonable seeming, to do well in the land of their adoption. and were made of the right sort of material for braving and for mastering the initial difficulties and discomforts of an emigrant career.

By the time that the glinting sunshine flashed on the brazen vane that pointed to the north-west from the spire of Limerick Cathedral, indicating also high noon, a young man of superior port and breeding, stepped up to Captain O'Connor, who was superintending the final preparations for departure, and stayed his action.

"Very well, Mr. Embury," said the skipper, a little unwillingly, perhaps, "but you'll have to look alive, for I must and will catch the turn of the tide, or by the bones av the blessed Saint Pathrick we shall be on the sands of Ballymuir before we get clear av the Shannon shore; an' that's not only poetry, but a bit av ugly prose."

The young man had turned away before the free-spoken skipper had finished his sentence, and beckoning with his hand to the waiting emigrants, he approached the taffrail of the Colleen Bawn, and took up a position which commanded sight and sound, not only of the clustering voyagers, but of the crowd of sad and tearful spectators (chiefly friends and neighbors) who lined the shore.

Putting his hand into his breast pocket, and failing to find what he sought, he turned to a staid and sober-looking man, evidently of German stock, and said: "Paul, ma bouchal, I've mislaid my Bible; lend me yours."

Paul Heck, the young and worthy husband of Mistress Barbara, instantly divining the purpose of his friend and leader, crossed over to his wife, who was seated in the stern of the vessel, and who had on her lap an old leather-bound, black-letter German Bible, and took the sacred volume from her.

"Shall I read for you, Phillip?" he said to the young leader before-mentioned, and soon he read out at Phillip's request, the following verses from the 107th Psalm, following the crabbed-looking print with perfect ease, and speaking loud and clear so as to command the attention of the entire audience:

"They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters: these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep. For he commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof. They mount up to the heaven, they go down again to the depths; their soul is melted because of trouble. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wits' end. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distress. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad because they be quiet, so he bringeth them to their desired haven. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

Here Paul passed the old Book to the keeping of brave Barbara, who took it and held it to her heart as though she loved it. As she laid it again upon her lap, she lifted up her face to the wondering Captain O'Connor, who saw a light there, as if an angel shone, and who read in the peaceful eyes that beamed upon him the secret of her assurance: "It will come true—true as that my name is Barbara Heck!"

Right, brave Barbara! You do well to pin unanswering faith to that "sure word of prophecy!" You do well to clasp the precious volume to your heart! Continue to hold the divine Talisman in highest honor and regard, for in the unknown future, to which the Colleen Bawn shall bear you, the subtle charm it holds, and the potent genius it commands, shall work wonders for you and yours, and for the generations that shall follow, wonders of which no tongue nor pen can tell the tale!

Philip Embury, who had practically shepherded for God these sheep of his, who were exchanging the bare uplands of Ballygarene for "fresh woods and pastures new," invited the willing crowd on ship and shore, to unite with him in prayer, and amid tears and sighs and sounds of sorrow that could not be restrained, asked the Only One to speed the parting band, and to have in his keeping the "old familiar" friends and neighbors left behind.

In a few well-chosen words, spoken directly from the heart, he bade the excited bystanders, in the name of himself and his comrades, a warm farewell; and on his lips the latest words vouched their abiding faith and testimony in the truth and love of their Master, Christ. Holding in his hand a rudely-printed tract or pamphlet containing some of Wesley's lately-published hymus, Philip Embury urged them to "dry their tears as true Christians can well afford to do and sing praises, as true be-believers can't help doing."

He read out the stirring lines he had chosen, two by two, and led the song in clear and tuneful voice; the whole crowd soon took up the strains, and surely the "silvery Shannon" neves carried on its broad waters the echoes of a more heartfelt or a sweeter song. No wonder that Captain O'Connor and his wondering crew were strangely stirred, and that rough hands were lifted to wipe away the dimming drops from eyes that were all-unused to tears.

> And let our bodies part,
> To different climes repair,
> Inseparably joined in heart
> The friends of Jesus are.
> O let our heart and mind
> Continually ascend,
> That haven of repose to find
> Where all our labors end.
> Where all our toils are o'er,
> Our sufferings and our pain,
> Who meet on that eternal shore,
> Shall never part again.
> We shall our time beneath
> Live out in cheerful hope,
> And fearless pass the vale of death,
> And gain the mountain top.
> To gather home his own,
> God shall his angels send,
> And bid our bliss, on earth begun,
> In deathless triumph ends.

No sooner was this sweet "Song of Zion," containing the above stanzas, ended, than the Captain, glad and fain to hide his own depth of feeling by an access of energy, cried out, "Now, lads! Throw off the moorings. Let go the stern ropes. Hi, there!" he shouted to the men in the shrouds, "shake out the tops'ls!"

In another moment, the Colleen Bawn was gently breasting the ruffled waters of the Shannon and glided out to sea. Farewell words were still being shouted both from ship and shore. Last adieus were waved by those whose eyes were blinded by a thickening veil of tears, but still the sweet and hopeful song of the emigrants sounded out from the deck of the Colleen Bawn, to the ears of the watchers on the quay.

> Who meet on that eternal shore,
> Shall never part again!

The sailing of that small vessel was, to all seeming, a comparatively insignificant event, and save the friends of those on board, little would the busy word have recked if it had foundered in the mighty deep. And yet that frail bark, the Colleen Bawn with its little band of peasants, was a second Mayflower, freighted with life, and love, and light, and liberty for untold millions of the human race; freighted with the germs of an immortal harvest to be reaped and garnered into the barns of God. Those earnest souls, in the flush of youthful hope and love bore with them and in them the divine leaven which was to leaven with its spiritual life, a third part of the whole round world!

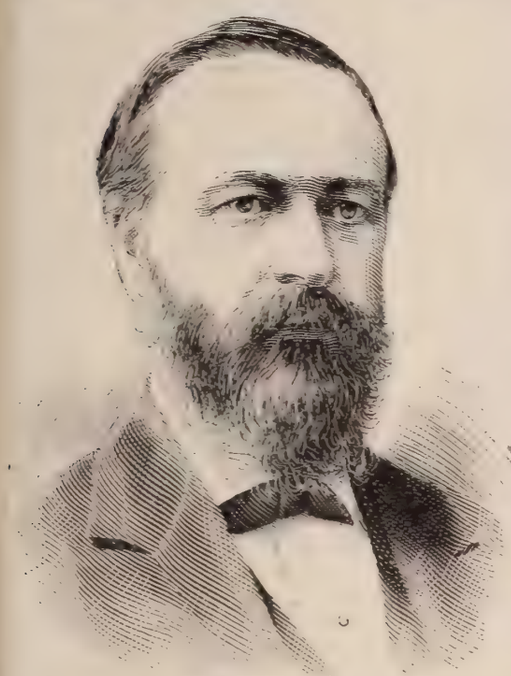
The Outrage at Marsovan.

How the Christian School, Recently Burned by the Turks was Established and Conducted—Portrait of Rev. Dr. Herrick.

BRIEF mention was made in this journal last week of the burning by a Turkish mob of the Girls' Boarding School, connected with Anatolia College, at Marsovan. Complete details of the outrage are doubtless on their way here by mail, and their arrival is anxiously awaited. In the meantime our readers will be glad to have the portrait of Dr. G. F. Herrick who was in charge of the Institution and some account of its history.



REV. GEORGE F. HERRICK, D.D.

The City of Marsovan is ancient Phasimon. It is situated in that part of Asia-Minor called Anatolia ("land of the sunrising"), and is close to the southern border of ancient Pontus. It is about 375 miles east of Constantinople, at one end of a plain, which is 2,600 feet above sea level. The town has a population of about 18,000 of whom probably two-thirds are Mohammedans, the remaining third mainly Armenians, with a sprinkling of Greeks. Marsovan, is the centre of a missionary district, extending along the Black Sea coast some 360 miles, and back southward, about 120 miles. The population of this region is estimated at about 355,000, of whom some 70,000 are Greeks, and 35,000 Armenians. The remainder are Moslems. The station was first occupied by American missionaries in 1852.

The present missionary premises occupy a commanding and pleasant site, at the extreme northern limit of the city, and comprise the buildings of the Theological Seminary, and of "Anatolia College" for young men; also the Girls' Boarding School and three missionary residences. The missionaries now there, are four American gentlemen, who, with a corps of six or more well-trained native professors and teachers, carry on the work of instruction in the College and Theological Seminary, and attend to the general work of the Station, which embraces twenty places outside of Marsovan, which are occupied by native pastors or preachers, or, in a few cases, by teachers only. Of these twenty places, eight are cities, six are towns and the rest are villages. The more distant places are five days' journey from Marsovan. The College was started as a High School, but after a rapid growth became "Anatolia College" in 1886. The present number of pupils is about 125; all Armenians and Greeks. Two Armenian ladies devote themselves to the interests of the Girls' Seminary, aided by Armenian and Greek native teachers; the membership of this school being from 80 to 100. The pupils in both schools come from far and near, from some thirty or more towns and villages.

The College is the chief feeder of the Theological Seminary, and this, in turn, supplies the men who carry on the work of evangelizing this large field, including some who go to the "regions beyond."

The Seminary was established at Marsovan in 1865. It had previously been located at Constantinople and had been under the care of Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D.D. The Armenian Board has had missionaries in this field since 1831, when Rev. William Goodell was appointed. During the next fifteen years, stations were established at Constantinople, Smyrna, Broosa, Trebizond and Erzroom. Schools were organized and the Bible was translated into the vernacular. Little opposition was encountered at first, but as the Armenians found that the converts refused to contribute to the places of worship, they began a fierce persecution. The native adherents were beaten, fined and often driven into exile. Nevertheless, a church with forty members was formed at Constantinople in 1846 and a native pastor ordained. The mission grew until twenty-five churches were formed, delegates of which met annually to arrange the work for the year. In 1860 it was found necessary to divide the Mission into three sections owing to the time consumed in traveling to and from distant places. By that time the field of its operations extended to the borders of Persia. Marsovan was placed in the section of Western Turkey. A firman was obtained from the Sultan by the exertions of the English ambassador, Sir Stratford Canning, guaranteeing civil protection to the converts of all the mission stations. In all these years the main advance was in educational work. The children proved the best converts and additional care was devoted to their training in the various schools.

The Anatolia College at Marsovan has long been one of the most important of these educational institutions. Its course of instruction includes Mathematics, Philosophy, Physiology beside the English, French and Greek languages and the religious departments, of which the most important is of course the evidences of Christianity, which is in charge of Dr. Herrick. Efforts are made to make the college as far as possible self-supporting. The fees for tuition are eleven dollars a year and the cost of board $29. The missionaries have, however, discretion to remit as far as the resources of the Mission will allow, the whole or part of the fees in special cases, in which the candidates are unusually intelligent but are not able to pay the full rates. Unhappily the condition of the treasury seldom warrants the admission of all who apply.

The girls' school attached to the College has been remarkably successful. Its popularity has grown even among the non-Christian people. An Armenian priest recently told one of the teachers that he intended to send his own daughter to the school when she was old enough. He frankly admitted that he had been opposed to the school at first, but since he had seen the character and acquirements of its graduates his opinion of it had completely changed. It is of course, the secular education provided that has won for the school its popularity, but the teachers take care that religious training occupies the chief place. Many of the girls have been received into the church, eight of them at one session. Not long ago a very extensive revival occurred in the college in which the girls' school shared. It extended even to the youngest pupils. The teacher was much touched by a visit from two little girls who said, "We wish you to give our hearts to Jesus." The elder girls, who know more of Christianity, have furnished some very bright examples of faith and conduct. American travelers who have visited the Anatolia College and the Robert College at Constantinople, are very thoroughly convinced that in this work lies the best hope of the evangelizing of this vast region.

Honest Medical Advice.

It is worth a great deal to a sick person to get an honest medical opinion. It is not always easy to do this, but there is a way in which such may be obtained, and that without any cost whatever. Drs STARKEY & PALEN, the discoverers and sole dispensers of that remarkable medical agent, Compound Oxygen, have never, during the twenty-three years of there wide practice, charged anything for consultation. If the sufferer from Consumption, Catarrh, Asthma, Dyspepsia, Nervous Prostration, or other serious chronic diseases, will write them a clear statement of his case, he will promptly receive an honest medical opinion, giving him chances of relief. He will also be welcome to a copy of the history of the discovery of Compound Oxygen, together with a large record of cases treated successfully. Among these may be found some exactly similar to your own. Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

The Caves of Elephanta.*

I HAVE not seen any other of those Indian rock-sanctuaries, but this one (on Elephanta Island, near Bombay), gave me a greater sense of artistic power and splendid purpose than anything in the way of religious architecture—be it mosque or Hindoo temple—that I have seen in India. It consists of a huge, oblong hall, fifty yards square, cut sheerly into the face of the rock, with lesser halls opening into it on each side. Huge pillars of rock, boldly but symmetrically carved, are left in order to support the enormous weight above; and the inner roof is flat—except for imitations of architraves running from pillar to pillar. The daylight, entering in mass from the front, and partly also by ingenious arrangement from the sides, is broken by the many great pillars, and subdues itself at last into a luminous gloom in the interior—where huge figures of the gods, 18 feet high, in strong relief or nearly detached, stand out from the walls all round. These figures are nobly conceived and executed and even now in their mutilated condition, produce an extraordinarily majestic effect, making the spectator fancy that he has come into the presence of beings vastly superior to himself.

On the back wall, immediately opposite the entrance, are three huge panels of sculpture—the most important objects in the temple. The hindmost of these consists of three colossal heads—Brahma, Vishnu and Siva—united in one; Brahma, of course, full-faced, the others in profile. Each head, with its surmounting tiara, is some twelve feet high and the portions of the busts represented add another six feet. The whole is cut deep into the rock so as to be almost detached; and the expression of the heads—which are slightly inclined forwards—is full of reserved power and dignity.

The whole series, to those who can understand, is a marvelous panorama of the human soul. The work is full of allegorical touches and hints, yet hardly ever becomes grotesque or inartistic. It provides suggestions of the profoundest philosophy. Yet the rudest peasant walking through these dim arcades could not but be affected by what he sees. In every direction there are signs of "go" and primitive power which point to its production as belonging to a time (probably about the tenth century, A.D.) of early vigor and mastery and of grand conceptions.

Horlick's Malted Milk

The milk served by the "milkman," is from twelve to forty-eight hours old It, especially in hot weather, takes on rapid chemical changes. The microscope proves it to be the most common conveyance of the Bacteria of Cholera–Infantum and Marasmus, and to this is traceable the large death-rate of infants during the summer months.

Pure Milk

The milk in Horlick's Malted Milk is treated within two hours from the cow. The animal heat properly extracted, then thoroughly sterilized and evaporated in vacuo to a dry powder. No disease germs are possible.

A Baby Food

Combine milk with wheat and barley as in Horlick's Malted Milk, prepared in such a form that it is not subject to climatic change, and we have a palatable food, free from starch, that is most nutritious and easily digested by the child.

At all druggists. Endorsed by all physicians. Send to us for a free sample.

BALLS OF FIRE

hurled into the ranks of an army could not have created the excitement and dismay that our

MURRAY $55.95 BUGGY and $5.95 HARNESS

have caused among the Buggy and Harness Manufacturers, Dealers and Agents throughout the United States. FOUR YEARS AGO we began selling our Murray Buggies and Harness direct to the consumer, barring out all Middlemen in the shape of the Dealer and the Agent, and giving to the consumers themselves the benefits of the immense profits heretofore squeezed and coaxed out of them by that class of men. We were fully convinced that by selling at first cost to the consumer direct, and by giving them the most substantial, the newest styles and the best finished work that could be produced, we would be eminently successful.

What has been the result of our four years' work in reforming the Buggy and Harness business of the country?

The result is simply this—that to-day our name is a criterion of QUALITY and LOW PRICES. Our "MURRAY" Buggies and Harness are more widely used than any three makes in the whole country. We have had to increase our Plant from year to year, until now we have the best facilities for serving our customers of any factory on the face of the globe.

WE'VE OUR FIGHTING CLOTHES ON!

and from now and henceforth the war will be more bitter than ever. The support we have received from all parts of the country fully warrants us in saying that we have friends by the Hundreds of Thousands, and with their support, we will the coming season make a record that will even eclipse our past glorious success. All people except fools have enemies—we have ours; they are the Factories, Dealers, Agents and Imitators, who are sore at our unprecedented success, and the loss of the "soft snaps" which they previously had, and they now spend their many idle hours in talking against the "Murray" Buggies and Harness. We like to have them talk, for they only advertise our work that much more—as any person easily sees, and were we not a most dangerous rival, they would not spend so much of their valuable (?) time in "grunting" against us. To these so-called "croakers" we can only say, that they have our sympathy, while we have the trade. If saving "Dollars" amounts to anything whatever to you, we're entitled to your support and trade. Write us for the GRANDEST CATALOGUE ever published; it contains about one hundred and fifty pages of illustrations and prices, which will be of great interest to you. Will mail you this Catalogue FREE OF CHARGE if you'll simply drop us a line asking for it.

John, "The Forerunner."

His Birthplace Among the Hills of Judea—Mary's Memorable Visit to Elisabeth—A Route Crowded with Sacred Memories—The Chapel of St. John of the Mountain at Karem.

REAT artists in every age, have illuminated with their genius the incidents connected with the Saviour's birth, his childhood and his work on earth. Immortal canvases have portrayed many of the scenes that are familiar to readers of the Sacred Word. One of the grandest of such pictures is that by Rubens, descriptive of the visit of Mary to Elisabeth. The story of Mary's journey to the hill country of Judea is told in Luke 1: 39-56. The sacred narrative relates how she entered into the house of Zacharias and saluted Elisabeth and that, when that godly woman heard the salutation of the virgin bride, she was filled with the Holy Ghost and prophesied. Elisabeth, who afterwards became the mother of John the Baptist, was the cousin of Mary, and the latter remained in her house about three months, after which she returned to her own home.

Zacharias was a priest who lived near Hebron, in the mountainous region of Judea, probably about eighty miles from Nazareth, the home of Mary. Both he and his wife were quite aged, and no child had ever been born to them. The reproach of barrenness—a heavy one even yet among the Jews—lay on their household, and they had many times bewailed the misfortune of childlessness. While the aged priest was ministering in the temple in Jerusalem and as he stood praying before the altar, appealing to God not only for the redemption of the people from their sins, but for their relief from the oppression of their Roman masters, the angel Gabriel appeared and announced that a son would be born to him, who was to be forerunner of the promised Messiah.

This angelic communication made a powerful impression on the venerable priest who, doubting his own senses and disbelieving the message, was smitten with dumbness. He emerged from the holy place, and on returning to his home informed his wife of the vision, making known the facts by signs and writing. It was shortly after this event that the visit of Mary took place. Zacharias and Elisabeth gladly received her, as she had come from Nazareth, three days' journey to the north, where Joseph the carpenter also lived. Poor and possessing no social rank, Joseph was yet of the royal blood, a direct descendant of David, and in the line of kingly succession. Mary also traced her lineage back to a throne, but like that of her betrothed, her station was a very humble one.

There are many legends and traditions told by non-canonical writers respecting this period of Mary's life. The ceremony of betrothal had taken place and during the interval between it and the marriage, she remained with her parents. It was about this time that the celestial messenger, who had formerly visited Zacharias in the temple, appeared to Mary, and announced to her the Divine will and the coming of Jesus. When the cousins met in Elisabeth's house, therefore, it was with mutual joy, and each was eager to tell the other of what had befallen her. It was a long journey in those days, and Mary was probably too poor to take other than the most humblest conveyance—an ass. Moreover, the country was dangerous and probably robber-infested. In all likelihood, she accompanied one of the numerous caravans that were constantly traveling on these highways. She was divinely protected amid the dangers of the journey, and on arriving at the home of Zacharias was received with gladness. The simple narrative of the New Testament tells in unadorned, familiar words, of the rejoicings of the two women. Mary's return to Nazareth was probably accomplished in the same manner, and under the same divine care as the southward journey.

She passed through valleys rich with memories of the great events of ancient history, and her route lay by places made illustrious and sacred by associations that led back to the days of the patriarchs. On her road she could see the field of Machpelah, where Abraham and Sarah were buried, the old oak of Hebron, under whose umbrageous limbs the patriarch Zacharias to Nazareth. Amid such scenes the childhood of John, the son of Zacharias and Elisabeth, was passed. As he grew into manhood doubtless he became familiar with every spot in those rocky fastnesses among the Judean hills, in Divine training for his work as the courier chosen to prepare the way among men for Mary's Son, the Babe of Bethlehem.

Although no memorial exists to mark the site of the house of Zacharias, near Hebron, the scene of the meeting between Mary and Elisabeth, and the birthplace of John the Baptist, there is a memorial church or chapel at the village of Ain Karem near Jerusalem, which is known as the Church of "St. John of the Mountain." This is shown in our illustration.

Travelers from Joppa to Jerusalem pass the village on the right, as they approach the Holy City. It is a summer resort and has a population of about 1000 and contains several Roman, Greek and Russian Convents and Monasteries. The Chapel of St. John together with the Russian church opposite, occupies a very commanding position on the summit of "the Mountain of Visitation," which overhangs the village. The chapel is supposed to be one of the many relics of the Crusaders found in Karem. The village is surrounded by vegetable gardens and vineyards and is a great source of supply for Jerusalem. It has abundant springs and these are utilized to increase the scant water supply of the greater city. At Karem, Gen. Gordon, the hero of Khartoum, spent the greater part of the last year of his life, before leaving on his fatal mission to the Soudan. Many pilgrims visit the place every year, inspect its antiquities and admire its beautiful gardens.

There are several conflicting traditions concerning the actual birthplace of "The Forerunner," but that generally accepted as authentic, and which is in perfect agreement with Luke's narrative, indicates the probable locality as Juttah, a very ancient village and suburb of Hebron, and lying a little to the south of that city. The surroundings are wild and mountainous, but the village itself is on a broad plateau, 2,800 feet above the level of the sea. Ruins on all sides show that the region was once thickly inhabited, although it is now little more than a pasture ground, surrounded by rocks abounding in caves and precipitous cliffs. There are no trees on the table-land, but in the spring it is a field of verdure and flowers.

FROM TWENTY TO SEVENTY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Psalm 90: 10, "The days of our years are three-score and ten."

THE seventieth milestone of life is here planted as at the end of the journey. A few go beyond it; multitudes never reach it. The oldest person of modern times expired at one hundred and sixty-nine years. A Greek, by the name of Stravaride, lived to one hundred and thirty-two years. An Englishman, by the name of Thomas Parr, lived one hundred and fifty-two years. Before the time of Moses, people lived one hundred and fifty years, and if you go far enough back, they lived five hundred years. Well, that was necessary, because the story of the world must come down by tradition, and it needed long life safely to transmit the news of the past. If the generations had been short-lived, the story would so often have changed lips that it might have got all astray. But after Moses began to write it down, and parchment told it from century to century, it was not necessary that people live so long in order to authenticate the events of the past. If, in our time, people lived only twenty-five years, that would not affect history, since it is put in print and is no longer dependent on tradition. Whatever your age, I will to-day directly address you, and I shall speak to those who are in the twenties, the thirties, the forties, the fifties, the sixties, and to those who are in the seventies and beyond.

First, then, I accost those of you who are in the twenties. You are full of expectation. You are ambitious—that is, if you amount to anything—for some kind of success, commercial, or mechanical, or professional, or literary, or agricultural, or social or moral. If I find someone in the twenties without any sort of ambition, I feel like saying: "My friend, you have got on the wrong planet. This is not the world for you. You are going to be in the way. Have you made your choice of poorhouses? You will never be able to pay for your cradle. Who is going to settle for your board? There is a mistake about the fact that you were born at all." But supposing you have ambition, let me say to all the twenties, expect everything through Divine manipulation, and then you will get all you want or something better. Are you looking for wealth? Well, remember that God controls the money markets, the harvests, the droughts, the caterpillars, the locusts, the sunshine, the storm, the land, the sea, and you will get wealth. Perhaps not that which is stored up in banks, in safe deposits, in United States securities, in houses and lands, but your clothing and board and shelter, and that is about all you can appropriate anyhow. You cost the Lord a great deal. To feed and clothe and shelter you for a lifetime requires a big sum of money, and if you get nothing more than the absolute necessities, you get an enormous amount of supply. Expect as much as you will of any kind of success, if you expect it from the Lord you are safe. Depend on any other resource and you may be badly chagrined, but depend on God and all will be well. It is a good thing in the crises of life to have a man of large means back you up. It is a great thing to have a monied institution stand behind you in your undertaking. But it is a mightier thing to have the God of heaven and earth your coadjutor, and you may have him. I am so glad that I meet you while you are in the twenties. You are laying out your plans and all your life in this world and the next for five hundred million years of your existence will be affected by those plans. It is about eight o'clock in the morning of your life, and you are just starting out. Which way are you going to start? Oh, the twenties!

"Twenty" is a great word in the Bible. Joseph was sold for twenty pieces of silver. Samson judged Israel twenty years. Solomon gave Hiram twenty cities. The flying roll that Zechariah saw was twenty cubits. When the sailors of the ship on which Paul sailed sounded the Mediterranean Sea, it was twenty fathoms. What mighty things have been done in the twenties. Romulus founded Rome when he was twenty. Keats finished life at twenty-five. Lafayette was a world-renowned soldier at twenty-three. Oberlin accomplished his chief work by twenty-seven. Bonaparte was victor over Italy at twenty-six. Pitt was prime minister of England at twenty-two. Calvin had completed his immortal "Institutes" by the time he was twenty-six. Grotius was Attorney-General at twenty-four. Some of the mightiest things for God and eternity have been done in the twenties. As long as you can put the figure "2" before the other figure that helps describe your age, I have high hopes about you. Look out for that figure "2." Watch its continuance with as much earnestness as you ever watched anything that promised you salvation or threatened you demolition. What a critical time, the twenties! While they continue you decide your occupation and the principles by which you will be guided. You make your most abiding friendships. You arrange your home life. You fix your habits. Lord God Almighty for Jesus Christ's sake, have mercy on all the men and women in the twenties!

Next I accost those in the thirties. You are at an age when you find what a tough thing it is to get recognized and established in your occupation or profession. Ten years ago you thought all that was necessary for success was to put on your shutter the sign of physician or dentist or attorney or broker or agent, and you would have plenty of business. How many hours you sat and waited for business and waited in vain, three persons only know—God, your wife and yourself. In commercial life you have not had the promotion and the increase in salary you anticipated, or the place you expected to occupy in the firm has not been vacated. The produce of the farm, with which you expected to support yourself and those depending on you, and to pay the interest on the mortgage, has been far less than you anticipated, or the prices were down, or special expenses for sickness made draughts on your resources that you could not have expected. In some respects the hardest decade of life is the thirties, because the results are generally so far behind the anticipations. It is very rare, indeed, that a young man does as did the young man last Sunday night when he came to me and said: "I have been so marvelously prospered since I came to this country, that I feel, as a matter of gratitude, that I ought to dedicate myself to God." Nine-tenths of the poetry of life has been knocked out of you since you came into the thirties. Men in the different professions and occupations saw that you were rising and they must put an estoppel on you or you might somehow stand in the way. They think you must be suppressed. From thirty to forty it is an especially hard time for young doctors, young lawyers, young merchants, young farmers, young mechanics, young ministers. The struggle of the thirties is for honest and helpful and remunerative recognition. But few old people know how to treat young people, without patronizing them on the one hand or snubbing them on the other. Oh, the thirties! Joseph stood before Pharaoh at thirty. David was thirty years old when he began to reign. The height of Solomon's temple was thirty cubits. Christ entered upon his active ministry at thirty years of age. Judas sold him for thirty pieces of silver. Oh, the thirties! What a word suggestive of triumph or disaster!

Your decade is the one that will probably afford the greatest opportunity for victory, because there is the greatest necessity for struggle. Read the world's history and know what are the thirties for good or bad. Alexander the Great closed his career at thirty-two. Frederick the Great made Europe tremble with his armies at thirty-five. Cortes conquered Mexico at thirty. Grant fought Shiloh and Donelson when thirty-eight. Raphael died at thirty-seven. Luther was the hero of the Reformation at thirty-five. Sir Philip Sydney got through by thirty-two. The greatest deeds for God and against him were done within the thirties, and your greatest battles are now and between the time when you cease expressing your age by putting first a figure "2" and the time when you will cease expressing it by putting first a figure "3." As it is the greatest time of the struggle, I adjure you, in God's name and by God's grace, make it the greatest achievement. My prayer is for all those in the tremendous crisis of the thirties. The fact is, that by the way you decide the present decade of your history, you decide all the following decades.

When I was in Russia, I was disappointed in not seeing the battle-field of Borodino. Why was there fought such a battle at that small village? It was seventy miles from Moscow. Why that desperate struggle, in which one hundred and twenty-five thousand Frenchmen grappled with one hundred and sixty thousand Russians, and thirty thousand dead Frenchmen and fifty-two thousand dead Russians were left on the field? It was because the fate of Moscow, the sacred city of Russia, was decided there—decided seventy miles away. And let me tell you people of the thirties, you are now at the Borodino, whence will resound its successes or its moral disasters clear on into the seventies, if you live to the threescore and ten of the text.

Next I accost the forties. Yours is the decade of discovery. I do not mean the discovery of the outside, but the discovery of yourself. No man knows himself until he is forty. He over-estimates or under-estimates himself. By that time he has learned what he can do, or what he cannot do. He thought he had commercial genius enough to become a millionaire, but now he is satisfied to make a comfortable living. He thought he had rhetorical power that would bring him into the United States Senate; now he is content if he can successfully argue a common case before a petit-jury. He thought he had medical skill that would make him a Mott or a Grosse or a Willard Parker or a Sims; now he finds his sphere is that of a family physician, prescribing for the ordinary ailments that afflict our race. He was sailing on in a fog and could not take a reckoning, but now it clears up enough to allow him to find out his real latitude and longitude. He has been climbing, but now he has got to the top of the hill, and he takes a long breath. He is half-way through the journey at least, and he is in a position to look backward or forward. He has more good sense than he ever had. He knows human nature, for he has been cheated often enough to see the bad side of it, and he has met so many gracious and kindly and splendid souls, he also knows the good side of it. Now, calm yourself. Thank God for the past, and deliberately set your compass for another voyage. You have chased enough thistledown. You have blown enough soap bubbles. You have seen the unsatisfying nature of all earthly things. Open a new chapter with God and the world. This decade of the forties ought to eclipse all its predecessors in worship, in usefulness and in happiness. "Forty" is a great word in the Bible. God's ancient people were forty years in the Wilderness. Eli judged Israel forty years. David and Solomon and Jehoash reigned forty years. When Joseph visited his brethren he was forty years old. Oh, this mountain-top of the forties! You have now the character you will probably have for all time and all eternity. God, by his grace, sometimes changes a man after the forties, but after that a man never changes himself. Tell me, Oh, men and women who are in the forties, your habits of thought and life, and I will tell you what you will forever be. I might make a mistake once in a thousand times, but not more than in that proportion.

My sermon next accosts the fifties. How queer it looks when in writing your age you make the first of the two figures a "5." This is the decade which shows what the other decades have been. If a young man has sown wild oats, and he has lived to this time, he reaps the harvest of it in the fifties, or if by necessity he was compelled to overtoil in honest directions, he is called to settle up with exacting nature sometime during the fifties. Many have it so hard in early life that they are octogenarians at fifty. Sciaticas and rheumatisms and neuralgias and vertigos and insomnias have their playground in the fifties. A man's hair begins to whiten, and although he may have worn spectacles before, now he asks the optician for No. 14 or No. 12, or No. 10. When he gets a cough and is almost cured, he hacks and clears his throat a good while afterward. Oh, ye who are in the fifties, think of it! A half century of blessing to be thankful for, and a half century subtracted from an existence which, in the most marked cases of longevity, hardly ever reaches a whole century. By this time you ought to be eminent for piety. You have been in so many battles, you ought to be a brave soldier. You have made so many voyages, you ought to be a good sailor. So long protected and blessed, you ought to have a soul full of doxology. In Bible times in Canaan every fifty years was by God's command a year of jubilee. The people did not work that year. If property had, by misfortune, gone out of one's possession, on the fiftieth year it came back to him. If he had fooled it away, it was returned without a farthing to pay. If a man had been enslaved, he was, in that year, emancipated. A trumpet was sounded loud and clear and long, and it was the trumpet of jubilee. They shook hands, they laughed, they congratulated. What a time it was, that fiftieth year! And if under the old dispensation it was such a glad time, under our new and more glorious dispensation let all who have come to the fifties hear the trumpet of jubilee that I now blow. That was the allusion made by Mr. Toplady, the great hymnologist, when he wrote :

Blow ye the trumpet, blow
The gladly solemn sound :
Let all the nations know,
To earth's remotest bound,
The year of jubilee is come ;
Return, ye ransomed sinners, home.

Ye who have sold for nought
Your heritage above,
Shall have it back unbought,
The gift of Jesus' love.
The year of jubilee has come;
Return ye ransomed sinners home.

My sermon next accosts the sixties. The beginning of that decade is more startling than any other. In his chronological journey, the man rides rather smoothly over the figures "2" and "3" and "4" and "5," but the figure "6" gives him a big jolt. He says: "It cannot be that I am sixty. Let me examine the old family record. I guess they made a mistake. They got my name down wrong in the roll of births." But, no, the older brothers or sisters remember the time of his advent, and there is some relative a year older and another relative a year younger, and sure enough the fact is established beyond all disputation. Sixty! Now your great danger is the temptation to fold up your faculties and quit. You will feel a tendency to reminisce. If you do not look out you will begin almost everything with the words, "When I was a boy." But you ought to make the sixties more memorable for God and the truth than the fifties or the forties or the thirties. You ought to do more during the next ten years than you did in any thirty years of your life, because of all the experience you have had. You have committed enough mistakes in life to make you wise above your juniors. Now, under the accumulated light of your past experimenting, go to work for God as never before. When a man in the sixties folds up his energy and feels he has done enough, it is the devil of indolence to which he is surrendering, and God generally takes the man at his word and lets him die right away. His brain, that under the tension of hard work was active, now suddenly shrivels. Men, whether they retire from secular or religious work, generally retire to the grave. No well man has a right to retire. The world was made for work. There remaineth a rest for the people of God, but it is in a sphere beyond the reach of telescopes. The military charge that decided one of the greatest battles of the ages—the battle of Waterloo—was not made until eight o'clock in the evening, but some of you propose to go into camp at two o'clock in the afternoon.

My subject next accosts those in the seventies and beyond. My word to them is congratulation. You have got nearly, if not quite through. You have safely crossed the sea of life and are about to enter the harbor. You have fought at Gettysburg and the war is over. Here and there a skirmish with the remaining sin of your own heart and the sin of the world, but I guess you are about done. There may be some work for you yet on small or large scale. Bismarck of Germany vigorous in the eighties. The prime minister of England strong at eighty-four. Haydn composing his oratorio "The Creation" at seventy years of age. Isocrates doing some of his best work at seventy-four. Plato busy thinking for all succeeding centuries at eighty-one; Noah Webster after making his world-renowned dictionary, hard at work until eighty-five years old; Rev. Daniel Waldo praying in my pulpit at one hundred years of age; Humboldt producing the immortal "Cosmos" at seventy-six years; William Blake at sixty-seven learning Italian so as to read Dante in the original. Lord Cockburn at eighty-seven writing his best treatise. John Wesley stirring great audiences at eighty-five. William C. Bryant, without spectacles, reading in my house "Thanatopsis" at eighty-three years of age. Christian men and women in all departments serving God after becoming septuagenarians and octogenarians and nonagenarians prove that there are possibilities of work for the aged, but I think you who are passed the seventies are near being through. How do you feel about it? You ought to be jubilant because life is a tremendous struggle, and if you have got through respectably and usefully, you ought to feel like people toward the close of a summer day seated on the rocks watching the sunset at Bar Harbor or Cape May or Lookout Mountain. I am glad to say that most old Christians are cheerful. Daniel Webster visited John Adams a short time before his death, and found him in very infirm health. He said to Mr. Adams: "I am glad to see you. I hope you are getting along pretty well?" The reply was: "Ah, sir, quite the contrary. I find I am a poor tenant, occupying a house much shattered by time. It sways and trembles with every wind, and what is worse, sir, the landlord, as near as I can make out, does not intend to make any repairs." Dr. Beman, after passing into the seventies, was asked by my friend, Rev. Dr. Spear: "Dr. Beman, how is your health now?" and he replied: "I have on me an incurable disease." "What is that?" asked my friend, and the septuagenarian replied, "Old age." Both of the old men I have mentioned intended their remarks for facetiousness and old people have a right to be facetious. An aged woman sent to her physician and told him of her ailments, and the doctor said: "What would you have me do, madam? I cannot make you young again." She replied: "I know that, doctor. What I want you to do is to help me to grow old a little longer." The young have their troubles before them. The old have their troubles behind them. You have got about all out of this earth that there is in it. Be glad that you, an aged servant of God, are going to try another life and amid better surroundings. Stop looking back and look ahead. Oh, ye in the seventies and the eighties and the nineties, your best days are yet to come, your grandest associations are yet to be formed, your best eyesight is yet to be kindled, your best hearing is yet to be awakened, your greatest speed is yet to be traveled, your gladdest song is yet to be sung. The most of your friends have gone over the border and you are going to join them very soon. They are waiting for you. They are watching the golden shore to see you land. They are watching the shining gate to see you come through. They are standing by the throne to see you mount. What a glad hour when you drop the staff and take the sceptre, when you quit the stiffened joints and become an immortal athlete. But hear! hear! a remark pertinent to all people whether in the twenties, the thirties, the forties, the fifties, the sixties, the seventies or beyond. What we all need is to take the supernatural into our lives. Do not let us depend on brain, and muscle and nerve. We want a mighty supply of the supernatural. We want with us a divine force mightier than the waters and the tempests and when the Lord took two steps on bestormed Galilee, putting one foot on the winds and the other on the waves, he proved himself mightier than hurricane and billow. We want with us a divine force greater than the fires, and when the Lord cooled Nebuchadnezzar's furnace until Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego did not even have to fan themselves, he proved himself mightier than the fire. We want a divine force stronger than wild beast, and when the Lord made Daniel a lion-tamer, he proved himself stronger than the wrath of the jungles. There are so many diseases in the world we want with us a divine Physician capable of combatting ailments, and our Lord when on earth showed what he could do with catalepsy and paralysis and ophthalmia and dementia. Oh, take this supernatural into all your lives. How to get it? Just as you get anything you want. By application. If you want anything you apply for it. By prayer apply for the supernatural. Take it into your daily business. Many a man has been able to pay only fifty cents on the dollar, who if he had called in the supernatural, could have paid one hundred cents on the dollar. Why do ninety-eight men out of a hundred fail in business? Because there are not more than two men out of a hundred who take God into their worldly affairs.

"AH, SIR, I FIND I AM A POOR TENANT!" SAID JOHN ADAMS.

. . . behind the great unknown
Standeth God within the shadows,
Keeping watch upon his own.

A man got up in a New York prayer-meeting and said : "God is my partner. I did business without him for twenty years, and failed every two or three years. I have been doing business with him for twenty years and have not failed once." Oh! take the supernatural into all your affairs. I had such an evidence of the goodness of God in temporal things when I entered active life, I must testify. Called to preach at lovely Belleville in New Jersey, I entered upon my work. But there stood the empty parsonage, and not a cent had I with which to furnish it. After preaching three or four weeks the officers of my church asked me if I did not want to take two or three weeks' vacation. I said, "Yes!" for I had preached about all I knew, but I feared they must be getting tired of me. When I returned to the village after the brief vacation, they handed me the key of the parsonage, and asked me if I did not want to go and look at it. Not suspecting anything had happened, I put the key into the parsonage door and opened it, and there was the hall completely furnished with carpet and pictures and hat-rack, and I turned into the parlors and they were furnished, the softest sofas I ever sat on, and into the study, and found it furnished with book-cases, and I went to the bed rooms, and they were furnished, and into the pantry, and that was furnished with every culinary article, and the spice-boxes were filled, and a flour barrel stood there ready to be opened, and I went down into the dining-room, and the table was set and beautifully furnished, and into the kitchen, and the stove was full of fuel, and a match lay on the top of the stove, and all I had to do in starting house-keeping was to strike the match. God inspired the whole thing, and if I ever doubt his goodness, all up and down the world, call me an ingrate. I testify that I have been in many tight places, and God always got me out, and he will get you out of the tight places.

But the most of this audience will never reach the eighties or the seventies or the sixties or the fifties or the forties. He who passes into the forties has gone far beyond the average of human life. Amid the uncertainties take God through Jesus Christ as your present and eternal safety. The longest life is only a small fragment of the great eternity. We will all of us soon be there.

Eternity! how near it rolls,
Count the vast value of your souls.
Beware and count the awful cost
What they have gained, whose souls are lost.

MY TIME IS UP.

"The days of our years are three score and ten." Ps. 90: 10.

MY time is up, three score and ten,
The years allotted unto men,
Have run their cycles one by one,
Since my life's journey first begun.

My time is up, my race is run,
And yet my work how poorly done;
Sad but vain regrets I cast,
Along the pathway of the past.

My time is up, O, what a thought,
With what a solemn meaning fraught,
And yet why should I quake or fear
Since only a sojourner here?

My time is up, at thy right hand
O loving Saviour I would stand,
All ready when the summons comes
That calls me to my heavenly home.

My time is up, soon I shall see
The dear ones now awaiting me,
And those I leave, 'twill not be long,
Before they, too, will join the throng.

My time is up, and yet I stay,
Awaiting God's appointed way,
Yet day and months and years may be
In mercy still reserved for me.— G. H. L.

THE VANITY OF GRAVEN IMAGES.*

S. S. Lesson for March 19. Isa. 44: 9-20. Golden Text, Isa. 45: 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SINCE the early days of this Pentecostal dispensation, there has never been such an impetus to missionary work as at the present time. Very gradually has the Church of Christ awakened to her calling to "go out into all the world" and to "preach the Gospel to every creature," and even now, when missionaries are going out from some lands by hundreds in a year, and when thousands are offering themselves for missionary work, it is only here and there that the Church in general feels her responsibility in the matter.

When Paul and Barnabas were singled out by the Holy Ghost to be missionaries (Acts 13: 2), they were ready to trust for their daily bread or to work for it with their own hands just as God should lead them, without making any plan beforehand. The power of their life and of their work was personal, immediate, unintermittent contact with the living God, at whose call, and in whose service they went forth. Such men could teach idolaters the folly of idolatry by force of contact. A man like Paul, who could be stoned and left for dead at Lystra (Acts 14: 19), and who as praying disciples stood around him, could rise up in the strength of his God, not a mangled mass of bruised flesh and broken bones, but in vigor and with sufficient courage to walk into the city where his persecutors dwelt, would not have much difficulty in persuading the people that his God could do more for him than their idols could do for them. When at Philippi, God sent an earthquake for his deliverance, when at Ephesus the very handkerchiefs taken from his body communicated healing to the sick (Acts 19: 12), and at Miletus he was used of God for the raising of Eutychus from the dead (Acts 20: 9-10), Paul had facts on his side to prove the reality, the power, the presence of the God he served. This was God's first missionary, and he could speak with indisputable authority to the worshippers of graven images. What the the heathen need is not fine words or advanced education, so much as to know that God is real to those who come to teach them. "I am the Lord and there is none else; there is no God beside me."

What is the intrinsic difference between the heathen and the worshippers of Jehovah? Is it not that our God has formed us, but the heathen create their own God; our God bears and carries his people (Isa. 43: 9), but the heathen must carry their Gods. (Isa. 46: 1-7.) Our God seeks intelligent intercourse with his children and demands their obedience and trust; the poor heathen have only unfounded imagination, a miserable, groundless superstition about their gods; they have a religion without any sense of moral responsibility. In contrasting himself and his worship with that of graven images, our God says through his prophet: "I am the First, and I am the Last, and beside me there is no God." (Isa 44: 6.) If a God is not superior to the beings that worship him, then worship must debase instead of elevating. Where God is not the First and the Last with us, our worship resembles that of the heathen. Where did you go last Sunday evening? was asked of a young man. "O, I went to the cathedral to hear the music." Was this worship, or was it self-gratification? Self-gratification in religion is the principle which gives the lie to the life and teaching of our Lord. If the Word made flesh and dwelling amongst us means anything, it means that he who left all for us has a right to expect us intuitively to leave all self gratification for him.

Who hath formed a God or molten a graven image that is profitable for nothing? A god that is profitable for nothing! A useless God! We pity the poor heathen and talk of sending missionaries to them; and yet, are there not many who go by the name of Christian, and yet treat their God as though he were no more to be relied upon than a heathen idol? "What a wonderful answer to prayer!" one has heard even converted people say, just as though answers to prayer were almost unknown in their lives! One can understand the poor heathen looking upon it as an uncertainty whether a prayer made to an idol of their own making can avail anything, and one can understand that a petition to such a helpless god must need a great deal of fervency in the petitioner, and the idolmaker who is greater than his false God. But it is a piteous thing when a Christian is so little aquainted with his God that his prayers are as uncertain as those of the heathen, and all his intercourse with God is befogged and beclouded with unbelief.

He burneth part of it in the fire, with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth roast and is satisfied, yea, he warmeth himself, and saith: "Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire, and he maketh a god, even his graven image." His god takes the last place in his life—his own needs and comfort are the first consideration. Our God must be the first and the last with us or he is practically nothing. The god of the heathen has nothing to do with all these things of daily life, but the residue, that which he can spare, that which is convenient to him the heathen bestows upon his god, and then, in the most utter absence of all reason he bows down to the image made of the residue of his tree, and says: "Deliver me, for thou art my God!" Such is the blindness, the utter irrational character of heathenism in which millions are steeped to this day.

But if Christians who give something of their means to the support of missionary work, who sometimes in prayer think of the missionaries, and who consider that they have their part in sending them out—act in a similar way to the living God—are they not hypocrites? How much time in the day, Christian reader, do you give to your God? Perhaps to eating and drinking you may give about two hours or more, to dressing and undressing say an hour, to exercise perhaps another hour, to business say eight hours or so, to recreation two or three, but to God, how much? The residue: five minutes, ten minutes, half an hour at most, out of a day of about sixteen hours awake! How much money do you spend for the Lord? Housekeeping, clothing, traveling, all are carefully reckoned, but for God, how much? What proportion? "Oh, what I can afford." The residue. How much of your strength is put at the Lord's disposal? What do you say? I must attend to business, it is my duty to support my family; then I must of course do as the world does, and fulfil the requirements of society; how can I keep up my position without? My health requires a little innocent recreation. "Well, and how much do you consider that the requirements of God's kingdom demand? O, you say, I don't profess to be a saint." No: my poor brother, that is too true. But do you know that in giving only the resinue of your strength to the Lord you are whom you send missionaries to teach? How can you reasonably expect that the heathen shall exchange their convenient gods, who never arouse their consciences, for your God, when they see that your esteem for him is not greater than theirs for their idols? They see you as much set on earthly things as they are, how shall they understand the call of the missionary to them that they shall seek those things which are above, when you who pay missionaries to teach them, are yourself minding earthly things? It was not the preaching of missionaries but the real presence and power of their God to men who witnessed for him, which convinced a Pharaoh, a Nebuchadnezzar, a Darius, that the God of Israel was a true God. Men who live near enough to God to put him to the test do not grudge God all their heart, all their mind, all their soul and all their strength. Whatsoever they do in word or deed they "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." It is a cruel thing to rob a poor heathen of his superstition, and leave him with nothing better. There is a cry in many a human heart like that of David when he said: "My soul thirsteth for God for the living God," and no heart of man is at rest until he knows, personally and experimentally, a God whom he can look up to, depend upon, honor and obey, One who is to him the First and the Last, the All and Everything, the Beginning and the End of his horizon.

"They know not neither do they consider." It is the same reproach which he makes against Israel: "The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." (Isa. 1: 3.) But there follows a terrible truth—that when men harden themselves against God, he treats them like the barren fig tree which might never bear fruit again, and a judicial blindness falls upon them. They would not know when they might have known and now "He hath shut their eyes that they cannot see and their hearts that they cannot understand. And none considereth in his heart, neither is there knowledge or understanding to say: I have burned part of it in the fire; yea also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof; I have roasted flesh and eaten it; and shall I make the residue thereof an abomination; shall I fall down to the stock of a tree? He feedeth on ashes, a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say: Is there not a lie in my right hand?" If men do not use reason to find out God; the time will come when this precious gift will be no longer in the power of those who trifle with it. Anointed missionaries full of the Holy Ghost, living in God's presence, might read these words of God himself in the Spirit, and surely the idols would be thrown to the moles and to the bats.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AS the International Committee offers the choice of two subjects for the lesson for March 19th, and as many schools will doubtless choose that of Temperance in preference to that of Vanity of Idols, it may be useful to devote this column to that subject. The passage selected for study is Proverbs 23: 15-23. The words are those of solemn warning and admonition from a loving father to a son who is exposed to temptation. Much as the times have changed in the twenty-nine centuries which have elapsed since the advice was given, they may be used with perfect propriety at the present time. With all our progress and enlightenment, we have not been able to suppress the evils referred to, and the youth who goes out into the world now, is as likely to be tempted in that way as was the youth to whom they were first addressed. He is reminded that his conduct will not affect himself alone, but that his parents will suffer by his misconduct, or will be made happy by his good behavior. He is exhorted not to envy sinners their pleasures and is assured that in obeying God he will save himself from disappointment and a wasted life. Then, entering into details, as if foreseeing the temptations most likely to assail him, he is urged to keep out of bad company and to avoid gluttony and drunkenness. Apparently it was not necessary then, any more than it is now, to show the youth the absurdity of cutting down a tree, carving an image and worshipping it. But the other danger was real and imminent, as it is to-day.

In the fear of the Lord all the day long. The word here is not to be understood in the light of dread or apprehension. It is rather the fear that a child might have of grieving a loving father, or a conscientious servant might have of losing the confidence of his employer. On a very cold night a gatekeeper at a railway depot demanded that each passenger show his ticket. Several bitterly complained of the delay and inconvenience. "You are a very unpopular man to-night," said a spectator. "I only care to be popular with one man," he replied, "and that is the superintendent." In the same way Christians should take care that their actions are pleasing to God, and if they have to displease man they must remember that "we ought to obey God rather than men."

Surely there is an end. No man sets out to be a drunkard. He has control over himself and knows that he can stop drinking when he wants to do so. But after a time he is weaker and the power of the drinking habit stronger. Then it is not so easy to stop. In the end he loses all his power and self-control and is in the power of his enemy. Some time ago a party of sailors visited the Zoological Gardens. One of them, excited by the liquor he had taken, and as an act of bravado to his companions, took hold of a deadly serpent. He held it up, having seized it by the nape of the neck in such a way that it could not sting him. As he held it, the snake (unobserved by him) coiled itself around his arm and at length it got a firm grasp, and wound tighter and tighter, so that he was unable to detach it. As the pressure of the snake increased, the danger grew, and at length the sailor was unable to maintain his hold on the neck of the venomous reptile, and was compelled to loose it. What did the snake then do? It turned around and stung him, and he died. So it is with the appetite of strong drink.

"In the forest," says a preacher, "I saw a beautiful tall tree slowly dying, strangled by great coils of ivy. There is no possibility of untwisting the folds, they are too giant-like and fast fixed, and every hour the rootlets of the climber are sucking the life out of the unhappy tree. Yet there was a day when the ivy was a tiny aspirant, only asking a little aid in its climbing; had it been denied then, the tree had never become its victim, but by degrees the humble weakling grew in strength and arrogance, and at last it assumed the mastery, and the tall tree became the prey of the creeping insinuating destroyer. The moral is too obvious. Sorrowfully do we remember many, many noble characters which have been ruined little and little by insinuating habits. Drink has been the ivy in many cases."

Be not among winebibbers. There is danger in association. No one is safe who habitually keeps company with wrongdoers. The effect of example, of the spirit of comradeship quickly saps the barriers which keep sin from entering the soul. Sophronius had a fair daughter named Eulalia, and she asked him one day for permission to visit the gay Lucinda. "I cannot allow it," said the Greek father. "Then you must think me exceedingly weak," said the girl indignantly. Sophronius picked up a dead coal from the hearth, and handed it to his daughter; but she hesitated to accept it. "Take it, my child—it will not burn you." Eulalia obeyed and the milky whitenes of her hand was instantly gone. "Father, we cannot be too careful in handling coals," said the vexed daughter. "No," said Sophronius, solemnly, "for even when they do not burn they blacken." Ye weaker ones—the cup may burn you; but if it will not burn, it will blacken—so beware. Touch not, taste not, handle not!

The drunkard and the glutton come to poverty. A physician walking along a country road was accosted by a man of dissipated appearance. The physician's eyes wandered compassionately over him and caught sight of the neck of a whiskey bottle protruding from his pocket. "Is this the way to the poor-house?" inquired the man, pointing in the direction in which he was going. "No," said the physician, "that is not the way to the poor-house, but," laying his hand on the whiskey bottle, "this is."

The habit has ruined thousands of brilliant lawyers, doctors, statesmen and noble men of all professions. They have started well with everything in their favor but the one thing—a love of stimulants, and when we expected to see them attain high position this one weakness has dragged them down. Canon Wilberforce says that one day he noticed a magnificent golden eagle flying bravely upwards. He watched it with admiration and delight, but soon noticed that something was wrong with it. It seemed unable to proceed. It stayed in its course, and by its uncertain movement showed that for some reason its strength was failing. Soon after it began to fall, and soon it lay, a few yards from his feet, a lifeless mass. What could have wrought the change? No human hand had harmed it. No sportsman's shot had reached it. He went to examine the bird and what did he find? It had carried up with it a little weasel in its talons, and as the eagle drew these near to its body for flight, the little creature had wormed itself out of them and had drunk the life-blood from the eagle's breast. How like the love of liquor is this! It may seem to be but a little matter, but it fastens on the soul and worketh death.

FIGHTING GOD'S BATTLE IN INDIA.

Rev. A. W. Rudisill's Gospel Labors Among the Hindus—Buddhists, Moslems and Catholics Worshipping Together—The Mission Press—An Indian "Mela"—"The Slave of Jesus."

IN India, for many centuries, the Brahmins have maintained their supremacy as promoters of intellectual darkness. Their histories, their geography, their works on astronomy, are idle fabrications, and their religious books are a corresponding series of absurdities. Christian truth dispels these lies as sunlight does the darkness. Christian tracts distributed in fields unoccupied by missionaries are often made the means of leading the priests, themselves, to Christ.

Sixteen years ago, in the Canarese country, about one hundred and fifty miles south of Hyderabad, lived a Lingite priest, named Maradappa, of wide influence, zealously teaching Hindu doctrines. A Christian tourist offered him a bundle of tracts, which, upon his refusing, were accepted by the headman of the village, who was so impressed by their arguments that he requested Maradappa to refute them. "That I can easily do," replied Maradappa. But after endeavoring for seven years to answer them satisfactorily, he, himself becoming convinced of the truth of the Christian religion, sought and found Christ. He then to receive baptism from the Rev. C. B. Warth, of the Basil Mission. Before the ceremony was performed he said:

Walked One Hundred Miles

"My parents named me for a heathen god, Maradappa, but now I wish to be called Yesu Dasa, the slave of Jesus."

He returned to Shallagi, his home, where he preached Christ, and suffered great persecution. A few years ago, he visited Rev. J. H. Garden, at Goolbarga Methodist Episcopal Mission, having brought five converts over one hundred miles to receive baptism. He is still preaching Christ, his pure life making his words weighty among the people.

The case of Yesu Dasa, thus led to Christ through the reading of tracts is one of many. And when it is borne in mind that the reading population of India is increasing by the million, it is easy to see that the printing press, if used with more vigor, and on a scale far beyond the ideas and plans of the past, must become a tremendous power. It is, therefore, a matter of thanksgiving that where most needed, God is raising up men and means to carry on this part of his work in heathen lands. The Madras M. E. Publishing House is a notable instance.

In 1886, Rev. A. W. Rudisill, D.D., then Presiding Elder of the Madras District, South India Conference, having acquired in early life a practical knowledge of printing, began in a small way to print tracts. A native who could act as foreman, set type, do press work, read proof, bind tracts, and keep accounts, was afterwards engaged for two dollars and fifty cents a month. The first apprentice was one of the native Sunday School scholars, a bright Christian lad of ten years, named Thoombu, who astonished all by his rapid progress. In a few years the office grew until forty hands were employed, and printing was done in five languages; English, Deccan, Hindustan, Tamil, Telugu, and Canarese, spoken by about fifty million people.

From the beginning, every day's work of the printing-office was in the Tamil language, and all the hands required to be present. Among the workmen are those representing different religious faiths; and it is an impressive sight to witness Mohammedans, Hindus, Roman Catholics and Methodists, harmoniously commencing the day's work with a Bible reading, singing hymns like "Rock of Ages," or "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," and all devoutly standing, while led in prayer. So far as known it is the first time in the history of the world that Hindus and Mohammedans, still clinging to their faith, met in daily religious exercises with Christians, and an interesting fact is that some of the orthodox Hindus take their turn at reading the Bible lesson for the morning.

But this striking innovation of holding prayers with orthodox Hindus and Mohammedans was not all smooth sailing. The plan was carried out for the first few months with comparatively little difficulty, when a prayer-strike was organized, and for a time threatened to bring these devotional exercises to a sudden termination. The ring-leaders waited on Dr. Rudisill, and informed him that unless "master opens like other offices, no pray, no sing, no read Bible, all the Hindus and Mohammedans will stop work."

The men were called together, and Dr. Rudisill asked:

"Shall I pray my God to curse you, your wives, and your little ones?"

All seemed horrified at the mere suggestion.

"Would not you then, rather I should ask him to bless you and yours?" he said. All assented.

"But that is just what I have been doing every morning," continued Dr. Rudisill, "where then is the trouble?"

After some further parleying, the leader's frown passed away, and he cried,

"Master Talks Very Good!"

Prayers then went on as usual.

It could hardly be expected that a vigorous prosecution of Christian vernacular printing in India would meet with no opposition. In a few years a Hindu Tract Society was organized. Instead, however, of issuing tracts defining and defending Hinduism, an attack was made on Christianity. This was wise. It was too great an undertaking to argue for the authenticity of a divine history that told of kings, thirty feet high, and reigns thirty thousand years long; or to contend for the accuracy of a sacred geography, which was made up of seas of treacle, and oceans of butter; and, in addition, to defend a revelation which taught that some rats went to heaven, because they trimmed a temple light while engaged in drinking the oil, and that some men went to hell, because they were a minute too late in throwing a flower on an idol!

It is, therefore, a striking fact that not one of their tracts tells about any religion except Christianity. One deals with Jesus Christ and his divinity; another refutes Christianity; a fourth describes the position of women according to the Bible; a fifth the character of Christ. In this last occurs the sentence:

"The God of the Christians is Jesus Christ. His friends were low caste people; his chariot was an ass; his diadem a crown of thorns; his throne was a cross; his cradle was a crib."

In reading these tracts with all their

Blasphemous Challenges

we can still exclaim with St. Paul, "Some, indeed preach Christ; even of envy and strife, and some also of good-will; the one do it of love the other proclaim Christ of faction; what then? only that in every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."

The work of the Hindu Tract Society led Mr. Raju Naidu, an associate editor of one of the Hindu periodicals published at Madras, to read diligently about the Christian religion. He visited the M. E. Publishing House, and Dr. Rudisill supplied him with Christian literature. He watched and made a study of the work among native women carried on by Miss Grace Stevens, superintendent of the M. E. Zenana Mission. In a short time he openly renounced Hinduism, professed Christianity, was baptized, and preached Jesus Christ in the streets of Madras. In a recent letter he says:

"I am charged with a high message from my Father in Heaven; I am an ambassador for him to show the world what I have myself seen in the great heart of God. I preach his Gospel because it has saved me; saved me, too, to the uttermost. Oh! how I rejoice in him, in his salvation, in his love! He saved me because I went to him a poor helpless sinner."

The conversion of Mr. Raju Naidu and clear testimony given fearlessly in his own city, and also published in the daily papers, raised to a white heat. They feared that since a leader had been won from their path, others might follow. Wherever a missionary appeared preaching and selling tracts, they stationed one of their most gifted speakers nearby, who made an attack on the Christian religion, and circulated anti-Christian tracts. But this did not hinder the work of the Lord. Hindus, who had never before taken enough interest in their own religion, either to defend or question it, now listened, not only to those who defamed them, but to the missionaries themselves. It happened here, as it has so often in the history of the Christian Church, that the fiercer the attack on the Christian faith, the more rapidly was its truth disseminated.

To be of practical use the mission press must not only be self-supporting, but in addition must earn enough by which to furnish colporteurs, missionaries, and Sunday Schools with Christian literature at less than the cost of the paper on which it is printed.

The Hindu Wage-Earner

receives on an average two dollars per month on which he must support himself and family. It is found best to charge him something for books and papers, but the price must be very small. Mission presses in India, must sell below cost and make up the deficiency on work done for banks, railroads, merchants, etc.

One of the most urgent needs of mission work in India, however, is suitable pictorial illustrations for Christian literature. In photography, India has made rapid strides, and photographs, as perfect perhaps, as can be found anywhere, are produced in that country. But in preparing pictures for the printing press nothing worthy of note has been done, and the press of India is entirely dependent on Europe and America for pictures of any kind. By the modern process of photo-engraving, the American Baptist Union in Rangoon, Burmah, reduced the cost of the Bible from $1.44 to 36 cents. As there is no photo-engraving establishment in India, this work was done in Boston. In the early part of last year, as Bishop Thoburn was about to sail for America, the missionaries urged him to make some arrangements in Germany, whereby they might forward photographs to that country and have plates prepared for the printing-press. But at that very time and in an unlooked-for manner, the way was being opened to take a complete photo-engraving equipment to India.

Mela is the name in India for

on the most extensive scale. The roads become crowded, and for days and nights, a sea of humanity pours into some sacred locality. From fifty to one hundred thousand people come together, and it is not an unusual thing for a half million to assemble. A few years ago at a Mela in Upper India, it was estimated that three million people were in attendance. And yet in assemblages so vast, the missionary's voice is almost useless. One night while passing along a street in New York City, Dr. Rudisill, who had returned home to recruit his shattered health, and was preparing for a speedy return to India, came upon an immense crowd interested in views flashed by a stereopticon on a mammoth screen. On a small scale for thirty years or more, the magic lantern has been a valuable missionary help. The thought occurred to Dr. Rudisill, that, while the lantern reached hundreds, a powerful stereopticon might be constructed, which would reach tens of thousands, and under favorable conditions, a quarter of a million of people at one time, as at a Mela. To prepare, transport to India, and put into successful operation a plant of such magnitude, would require not only a large sum of money, but also a person of some mechanical skill to operate the plant. Dr. Rudisill requested a circle of Christian friends to make the undertaking a subject of daily prayer. In a comparatively short time, over $5000 were received and his nephew, Mr. James Rudisill, a young man well fitted to take charge of the mechanical work, agreed to accompany him to India.

Bishop Thoburn gave the work his unreserved endorsement, and authorized Dr. Rudisill to appeal to the friends of mission work for the needed funds. The M. E. Publishing House at Madras will then consist of, First—the printing department, which will include book and job-printing, color-printing, bookbinding, photo-engraving, stereotyping and electrotyping; Second,—the selling department, which will include an apparatus for the manufacture of the calcium light; and a Gospel Bullock Cart, containing a stereopticon powerful enough to illuminate a canvas 100 feet square. Bishop Thoburn's which are eagerly read by the natives, will be pictorially illustrated, and in the Deccan-Hindustani, Canarese, Tamil and Telegu tongues, shown on this immense canvas by the stereopticon. After the Gospel has thus been preached, printed editions of the sermons, containing similar illustrations, will be sold by colporteurs. Pictures, illustrating religious books, and, above all the Bible, will be shown, thus inducing people to buy; for when the natives are interested enough to read, like the eunuch, they will soon be ready to hear a Philip preach, and to receive Christ by faith. To purchase this plant, erect suitable buildings, and procure printing material, will require $25,000, nearly one-half of which has already been raised in cash, or available subscriptions. The new development of Gospel work when complete, will stand as a memorial to the late Mrs. Mary M. Rudisill, the devoted wife of Dr. Rudisill, whose labors in India were remarkably owned of God.

NEW TESTAMENT TESTIMONY.

What Christ and his Apostles said of the Second Advent and the Millennium

BY REV. W. FRITH.

IN a former article we referred to some of the passages in the Old Testament concerning the second coming of Christ and the circumstances attending it; let us now see what the Lord himself had to say about it.

In addition to the most clear and explicit one, in John 14:3, we have several others:—

The promise is repeated in verse 18: "I will come to you." Nor will it be sufficient to say that this had exclusive reference to his reappearance after his resurrection; because this 18th verse stands or falls with verse 3, in which Jesus says, "I go to prepare a place for you," (which must have reference to the whole interregnum between the two Advents)—"I will come again" the Greek word means back again, and therefore must refer to his second coming in personal glory.

We pass over those parables in which this doctrine is most clearly taught, and refer to John 16:22, "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice," &c.: nor was the intention of the Redeemer limited to any re-appearance after his resurrection in this case. To be consistent this utterance must be read in the light of John 17:24 for it was spoken on the same occasion,—"that they may be with me where I am"—that is where "their heart shall rejoice."

Once more: In the institution of the Lord's Memorial Supper, we have a most beautiful and suggestive, though incidental, prediction of his second Advent—viz., "Until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." (Matt. 26:29.) Here, also, his second advent is implied beyond question; because, if this text is read in the light of John 14:3, he must come to receive his people before they celebrate the supper in glory.

Lastly, we must not omit those somewhat remarkable words addressed to Peter just before his ascension in answer to his curious question relative to John: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" (John 21:22.) Here, again, there can be but one interpretation: for his resurrection was past already, and therefore, it could have no other reference but to his second personal Advent.

We add no more; though there are many indirect and incidental references of great value which the student of the word will easily discover.

The Apostolical predictions of the Second Advent.

As preliminary, note that of the angel, recorded in Acts 1:11. This is worthy of special regard, because it is unique and singular, being the testimony of Heaven, and not of earth—of an angel who could make no mistake. Addressing the disciples, he says: "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus whom ye have seen go up into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." No words could be plainer; nor their meaning more unmistakable: the when is not given, but the fact is declared plainly; and it teaches us a very interesting truth—namely, that those holy beings know a great deal about the redemptive economy and the future purposes of God; and are also interested in the welfare of the Church on earth. But this angelic prediction is not yet verified, though it shall be in his time. And why should they not know, since they have evidently a grand mission to our earth? (Heb. 1:14.)

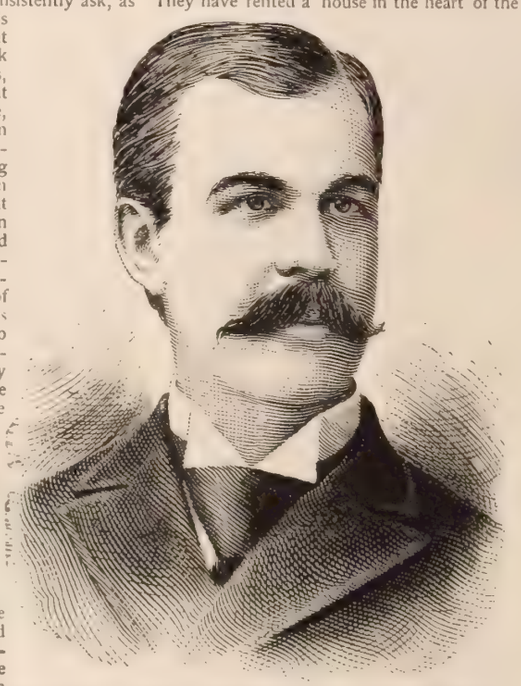
Peter's Address in the porch of the temple. "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of the restitution of all things." (Acts 3:21.) Now this declaration, taken in connection with the angel's prediction in chapter 1:11, is certainly a prediction of the Second Advent, implied in the word until, together with the purpose of his Advent—"to restore all things:"—a purpose which was predicted by "all his holy prophets since the world began;" and, therefore, must be verified in the fulness of time; for himself said: "All things which are written in the law and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me, must be fulfilled." Luke 24:44.

Paul, in addressing his Epistle to the Philippians says: "For our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we wait for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ." And that this has reference to the [illegible] one of the purposes of the Second Advent [illegible] note, too, that our Revised Version gives wait in place of "look"; but perhaps the two ideas blended together best conveys what is "the mind of the Spirit."

TEMPERANCE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing March 19. Proverbs 23: 15-23

PETER'S injunction to add to knowledge, temperance has not become obsolete. It may be contended with an awful basis of facts that no evil of our day causes so much misery and ruin as intemperance. What is the duty of the Christian in the circumstances? It is urged that the Bible in no way enjoins total abstinence from intoxicating liquor but the fact does not excuse indulgence. Putting aside the fact that there is danger to the Christian in the use of liquor—danger of his falling under its insidious power, there are other reasons for abstinence. Observing the effects on others of the drinking habit, is it not his duty to use all the means in his power to rescue them? He cannot consistently ask, as Cain did, "Am I my brother's keeper?" He may say that persons who cannot drink without drinking to excess, should abstain altogether. But if none abstained but those, they would be marked men who in addition to their struggle with their own craving would have to bear the odium and ridicule of others. That would be a very heavy burden to sensitive minds and would probably prevent a large number from abstaining. By adding one more to the number of abstainers the Christian makes it easier for the drunkard to abstain. He does not then become ticketed and labeled by his act as a weak man, because others who are not weak are abstaining, too. Then, too, the Christian who abstains exerts an influence on young people. There are potential drunkards all around him. If by his example he can induce any to abstain that one is beyond the reach of that one temptation. The Christian is one who lives for Christ and his fellow-men. As Christ gave himself for the world so should the Christian be ready to sacrifice himself for others. The first principles of his religion demand that he be a total abstainer. "To the weak," Paul says, "became I as weak." That is the duty of the Christian. If, as is evident, he can by his example do something to encourage the drunkard to become a sober man, and still more to keep others from becoming drunkards there can be no question as to his duty in the matter. If he were gaining in health and strength by the use of intoxicants which is a very doubtful supposition, he has still no right to avail himself of them. If he desires to follow the example of Christ, he must sacrifice his own advantage for the sake of others; and not in this only, in all ways in which there is opportunity of service he must take up his cross and follow his Lord or he cannot be Christ's disciple.



MR. ANDREW M'WHINNEY, PRESIDENT OF B.Y.P.U. OF N.ORANGE, N. J.

ONE OF THE B. Y. P. U. PIONEERS.

AMONG the States in which the suggestion of organizing a Baptist Young People's Union was most enthusiastically received was New Jersey. The Baptist Churches of that State responded promptly by forming local Unions and the larger churches soon had them well organized and in operation. One of the most ardent advocates of the movement there who soon became a recognized leader in the work was Mr. Andrew McWhinney whose portrait appears on this page. He was Superintendent of the Sunday School of Summit Avenue Church in Jersey City, in which there are nine hundred children, and was consequently fitted by his contact with young people to appreciate the value of such a project. Mr. McWhinney was a good man to be enlisted in the cause. Since he had united with that church by baptism at the age of fifteen, he had been a most energetic worker in its various spheres of usefulness and held other offices in connection with the church, beside that of Sunday School Superintendent. He earnestly advocated the formation of a Union and has since assisted in organizing Unions in other places. He took a prominent part in organizing the State Union and has been elected the first President of the Associational Union for the North New Jersey Baptist Association. Recently he removed to North Orange, N. J., where he is displaying similar activity in religious work. He is President of the Young People's Union of the Baptist church there.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE Leagues in and around Boston, Mass., have adopted the University Settlement idea. They have rented a house in the heart of the North End, which was once an aristocratic neighborhood, but is now fallen upon evil days, the haunt of Italians and the very poor. There are accommodations in the house for seventeen persons, and eight have already taken up their abode there. One of them is an Italian missionary. The house has been furnished throughout by the Epworth Leagues. It is proposed to make it a useful and helpful institution in all lines, except almsgiving. An example of cleanliness, a place where sympathy and advice and comfort may be had, and kindly words ready for all in trouble. It will be made known in the neighborhood that kind, sympathetic people are living there, and the influence is sure to be felt.—The Methodists of Keynsham, Somerset, England, have made an experiment in League work, incited thereto by reports from this side. They have made no regular organization. There are several societies in connection with the church which it is hoped will be federated so as to cover all departments. Until that is done, it would be unwise to form similar agencies in connection with the League which might be regarded as rivals.—The League of Fifth Avenue Church, Denver, Colo., has taken a new departure in resolving to give no entertainments for money-getting purposes. Hitherto sufficient funds have been received to defray all expenses and the League intends to hold to its resolution.—The General Secretary reports that there are now 9,504 regular Chapters and 1,283 Junior Chapters, making a total of 10,787. A Christian Endeavor Society in the city of Mexico has transformed itself into an Epworth League. There are now Chapters in Japan, Italy and Denmark.

THE HOSPITAL BED.

AN effort is being made by the Central Council of King's Daughters to complete the endowment of a free hospital bed in the New York Infirmary for Women and Children. The object is to have a bed in the Infirmary, marked with the emblem of the Order, which shall be set apart for the use of any sick member of the Order in the United States or Canada, who may be in need of the skilled medical attention of the staff of the Infirmary. To secure this bed in perpetuity five thousand dollars are necessary. Half of this sum has been offered by a friend of the Order, if the members will contribute the other half. In order to make the payments easier, it has been arranged to spread them over five years. If fifty circles will undertake to pay $10 a year, or a hundred circles $5 a year, the work will be done. The only qualification necessary for admittance to the bed, whenever it is empty will be that the candidate shall be a King's Daughter, sick and in need. No distinction is to be made as to race, creed or color. It is proposed to organize a special hospital chapter, in the event of the money being raised, the members of which will visit the occupant of the bed and see that she does not lack any comforts that she needs. Incurable cases will not be received as it is desired to extend the benefits to the largest number who may be in need of it. Contributions and promises to complete the endowment should be sent to Miss Julia B. de Forest, 15 W. 30th St., N. Y., and they should be clearly marked, "For the King's Daughters' Bed."

In Ancient Shechem.

How the Valley and Town of Nablous appear to Modern Eyes—The Twin Mountains, Ebal and Gerizim—A Marvelous History.

NABLOUS, the ancient Shechem, is distant eleven hours' journey from Jerusalem, on the great northern road through Palestine. It is the highway of traffic between Jerusalem and Damascus. Travelers making the journey usually pass the night at Bireh or Ramalleh, although many make the entire trip in one day. En route, the village of Shafut (the ancient Mizpeh), Tuliel-el-ful (Gibeah of old), Er-Ram, a pretty little hamlet, (formerly the powerful city of Ramah, the scene of Rizpah's devotion to her murdered sons), and Seilun, (the ancient Shiloh), are all passed in turn. Approaching Nablous, the country is wild and forbidding, and was for many years and until a comparatively recent date, frequented by robbers.

From the crest of a mountain ridge, a plain is seen stretching out below, and broken at the farthest end by a chain of mountains. In the valley between two hills—Mount Gerizim on the left and Ebal on the right—lies Nablous, lovely in situation and attractive in aspect. It is one of the very oldest cities in the world. The fertile lower levels of the surrounding hills are terraced with orchards and olive trees, and gardens are seen everywhere. Drawing still nearer to the city, we find Jacob's Well, a cistern about ten feet square, hewn in the solid rock. Around it stand the ruins of a church built by the Crusaders. An hour more and the white walls of Nablous rise before the traveler, and he enters the once famed city founded by and named after Shechem, the son of Hamor, a prince of the country long before the Hebrew conquest. Even in Abraham's day, Shechem was a city. It was near it that he pitched his tent and built an altar, under the "covenant oak" at Moreh, on first entering the land of promise. He found the Canaanites—the aborigines—already in possession of Shechem. They were idolaters and worshipped Baal-Berith. They were spared for a long time by the invaders, but finally the ancient Canaantish Shechem was entirely destroyed, a new Jewish city took its place, and the temples of Baal were converted into altars for Jehovah.

The Nablous of to-day is nearly as large as Jerusalem, and has about 14,000 population, Moslems preponderating. There are probably only a few hundred Samaritans, quite a sprinkling of Christians and a number of Hebrews Its bazaars are the principal attraction, but the streets are very poorly paved and exceedingly dirty. A great mosque in the centre of the city was once a Christian Church, built by the Crusaders. Another mosque, known as the Jama-el-Kadra, is said to stand over the spot where Joseph's brethren brought his coat to Jacob the patriarch, who had come to Shechem on returning from Mesopotamia. After Joshua's victorious campaign in which he destroyed the confederated kings he placed the tabernacle in Shiloh and thence went to Shechem, with all the people and, as Josephus the Jewish historian relates, raised an altar there as Moses had directed. Then he divided his army, placing one half on Mount Ebal and the other on Mount Gerizim, the altar and the priests and Levites being on Ebal.

After a sacrifice and the pronouncing of "blessings and denunciations," the great assembly was dispersed, but Joshua remained in Shechem. Long afterwards, the Samaritans (whose origin is described in II. Kings 17: 24–41), built a rival altar at Mount Gerizim, and the religious separation between them and the Jews became final when Manasseh, the brother of Juddua, the Hebrew High Priest, having refused to annul his marriage with the daughter of Sanballat, fled to Shechem and became the High Priest of the new sanctuary. Gerizim was declared the rightful centre of worship and doctrines and rites closely imitating those on Mount Moriah were adopted, the general character being, however, Sadducean rather than Pharisaic. Thereafter the Jews "had no dealings with the Samaritans." Even in the Saviour's time on earth, this bitter feeling predominated, and it found apt expression from the lips of the woman of Samaria, whom he met one Sunday evening by Jacob's well at Sychar (now called El Askar), on the outskirts of the olive-shaded valley road that leads down to Shechem, from which it is concealed by a spur of Mount Gerizim. Moreover, the Samaritans claimed that Gerizim had been directly chosen by God, and that it alone had not been covered by the flood. There is still a remnant of the Samaritans at Nablous, and there are also small bodies of the sect at Cairo and Damascus. They preserved their ancient faith and form of worship. In the temple in Gerizim there is a copy of the Pentateuch which they declare to be the oldest in existence, having been written by a grandson of Aaron. It is on parchment, fifteen inches wide and from twenty to thirty yards long, and contains the first five books of the Bible, but its true age is not believed to be much over a thousand years.

The valley between Ebal and Gerizim, in which the town of Nablous lies, is only 500 feet wide, and the summits of the twin giants are scarcely a mile and a half apart, yet voices can be heard from one mountain-top to the other. On Gerizim's summit are the ruins of several structures, Roman towers, mosques and churches. Nablous lays claim to very great antiquity, its namer and founder having been kinsman to Raguel, the father-in-law of Moses.

It is noted as the birthplace of Justin Martyr, the famous Christian philosopher of the second century. The Mohammedans, who have a keen sense of the beautiful, have a saying that "Allah loves the land of Syria beyond all lands and the place which he loves most is the mountain of Nablous." Travelers agree in pronouncing it one of the most charming localities in the whole world, with natural gardens and an entire absence of desert; the woods resounding with nightingales and other birds, the thickets laden with rich verdure, and the oak, the terebinth, the carob and the olive adding to the beauty of the scene.

Take Care of the Lambs.

"How do you get such beautiful sheep?" was a question put to a farmer. "I take care of the lambs," was the reply. There is a world for pastors in that reply. "If I was to repeat my ministry," said an aged pastor, "I would give my chief attention to the young." Says Dr. Rainsford: "We must put our strength into work among the children. We cannot do much with the people over twenty-five years old. The only way to do is to build the children into a Church." See to it that the first years of their careers are wisely directed; that truth is taught for truth's sake; kindness, neatness, if early instilled, will become easy; truth will be natural and more easily practiced than deception. Show by your daily life that example is more powerful than precept.

MOTHER AND HOME.

Written for The Christian Herald.

A LITTLE child in the busy street:
A child with shy face, flower-sweet,
And brown eyes, troubled and half afraid,
By the noise and hurry quite dismayed.
I lifted the baby hand and said—
Smoothing the curls on the golden head—
"Where is your home, my little one?"
For the summer's day was nearly done.

And the swift tears came at her reply,
As she trusting answered, sweetly shy:
"Home is where mamma is, you know.
Won't you take me there? I want to go!"
Where mother is! Oh, the word of love!
No matter how far our feet may rove;
When weary and worn in constant strife.
Mother and home are the best of life.

Blessed is he who may smiling say,
"I'm going home to mother to-day,"
God's mercy hallows that home so dear,
Where mother our footsteps waits to hear.
Bless the busy hands and the cheery smile
That brighten and comfort all the while;
Nothing on earth can with home compare
When a loving mother waits us there.

—DEPOSIT

A MOTHER'S DUTY.

THERE is nothing in all the world that is as dear to a child's heart as a true, loving mother. From the day the bright little eyes look up into its mother's face and smile, until death, there is nothing so close to that heart as mother. Although others may love us, and be good and kind to us, they cannot comfort like a mother's, care and love. Whatever our station in life, nothing can fill the place of the true, good mother.

Let me say to every mother who reads THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "Are you a true, loving guide to that little family the Lord has blessed you with? They are looking to you for an example to follow. Are you setting them such an example as you wish them to follow through life? Never tell them a falsehood, never deceive them in act, word or deed. Do not associate with those whose moral character is such that you would not want your daughters to associate with them; nor with those you would feel afraid to trust your daughters with at all times, and under all circumstances. Alway let your walk and conversation be as you wish those of your daughters to be. Almost invariably a daughter will follow a mother's footsteps. If the mother associates with the wicked and immoral, and leads a wicked life, the daughter is well nigh sure to do the same. If her associations are with good Christian people, there you will find the daughter also. Whatever life the mother leads the daughter is generally sure to follow.

Sooner or later the daughters will know just what a mother's life is. From the time they come to the years of discretion, they will watch you and strive to do just as you do. If some one asks them why they do thus and so, they will say, "Because mother does. If mother does, why should not I?"

Be good, true, faithful. Be choice of your associations. Look well to your daughters' associations; guard them on every hand. Teach them by example and precept to be moral, truthful, chaste, upright. Then you will be proud of them, and they will love, honor and respect you as long as you live. Remember, the world is full of pitfalls for the unexperienced. Teach them how to avoid them by chaste, helpful, industrious lives.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

WELLS OF SALVATION.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Isa. 12: 3, "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation."

THE twelfth chapter of Isaiah is a triumphal song; it is a joyful thanksgiving of the people of God for his mercy in giving them deliverance. It also looks forward to the greater deliverance of all believers under the leadership of Christ. Most Jewish interpreters refer this chapter to the time of the Messiah. The custom of drawing water from the fountain of Siloam, at the feast of the dedication, had its origin in the text of this morning. That fountain sprang up at the foot of Mount Zion without the city. The water having been drawn in a golden cup, was brought in through the water-gate into the temple; it was then mixed with wine and poured on the sacrifice on the altar with every expression of joy. This most joyful practice was not ordained by the law of Moses, and no benefits of that law quite justify this practice, or illustrate the words of the text. Our blessed Lord applied the teaching of my text to himself, when on the great day of the feast, while beholding the joyous ceremonies which accompanied the drawing of the water, Jesus stood and cried, saying: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." In that vast assembly there were many thirsty souls; they were dissatisfied with the shadow of good things and they longed for the substance. They were conscious of quenchless desires which Christ alone could satisfy; this fact Christ well knew. He desired to satisfy the immortal longings of their souls, and so he gave the sweet assurance of the sublime words which he used on that august occasion.

The Adequate Supply.

We observe in the first place, that there are wells of salvation. This is a blessed truth; this is a glorious certainty. The divinely created thirst in our souls can be satisfied only by a divinely prepared remedy. God will not mock us by giving us exalted longings for which there is no adequate supply. These noble desires show that we are not as the beasts which perish. We are made in God's image; and although that image is greatly defaced, it is not entirely effaced. The things of this life cannot satisfy our immortal natures. We cannot forget our high birth; we cannot be unmindful of Eden with its happiness and holiness, with our pristine purity and the divine presence, peace and joy.

What are some of the "wells of salvation" which God has graciously provided? We might say that the reference in the text is to the persons of the Trinity. God is expressly called the "Fountain of Living Waters." Similar language, as we have seen, is applied to Christ, and also to the Holy Spirit. In Eastern countries such language possessed a significance which it is difficult for us fully to appreciate, but which it is almost impossible for us unduly to exaggerate. Our humid climate and our abundant water supply rob these expressions of much meaning which Orientals understood so well. But the meaning of the text is broader than its limitation even to the Trinity. In Scripture usage a fountain is an emblem of that which produces joy; whatever cheers, supports and refreshes the soul may thus be called a fountain. In harmony with this view, the glorious salvation offered in the Old and in the New Testament is an open and up-springing fountain. There are, therefore, many wells

The Bible is Such a Well.

It is the blessed channel through which living waters flow. Our faith does not rest on the Book, except as the medium of the divine truth which saves the soul. The Bible is itself the miracle of miracles; it is in its preparation, its preservation, its unity, and its design more miraculous than is any event which it records. [illegible] and they too often neglect the Bible. It is impossible to read all the books published by the prolific press of the day. It is as undesirable as it is impossible. As well might you submit to having every man you might meet on Broadway to-morrow morning take you by the button-hole, as have every book published arrest your attention. There are however, certain classics that every well-informed man should read. Works of history, science, art, and some works of fiction there are which he should read, but not to the neglect of the Word of God. In it are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. When Sir Walter Scott lay dying he asked his son-in-law, Mr. Lockhart, to read for him. "What book?" asked Mr. Lockhart. "What book!" said Sir Walter. "There is only one book—the Bible—read that." He who had read so widely, and had contributed so many immortal pages to literature, gives this

Testimony to the Value of the Bible. Charles Dickens was in the habit of writing a letter to each of his sons as he left the parental roof. In one he urged his son, whatever other books he neglected, to read the Bible, as it contained the purest morality and the best rules of life known to the world. When Milton would become "a poet soaring in the high reason of his fancies, with his garland and swinging robes about him," he must go to the Bible for his highest theme. The music of "Silva's brook that flowed fast by the oracle of God," gives its charm to his lofty verse. When Raphael would perpetuate his name to unborn generations he must ascend "the holy mount," stand in the supernal glory, and gaze on the transfigured Christ. As the "Transfiguration" was his greatest, so it was his last work. He died on his thirty-seventh birthday, with the "Tranfiguration" on his heart and brain. That picture was carried with him to his grave at his burial. When Handel was discouraged by attempting to give opera in a foreign language, he accepted an invitation from several notables of Ireland to visit Dublin. From a friend he received a text from the Bible on which he composed his immortal work, known at the first as the "Sacred Oratorio," known now as the "Messiah." Both in Dublin and London this work gave him immediate fame; it has since crowned him throughout the world with unfading glory.

A Source of Inspiration.

The Bible gave Angelo, Tasso, and many others their noble themes and their lofty inspiration. The debt which music, painting, sculpture and literature, owe to the Bible cannot be fully estimated. It is said that the Red Cross Knight in Spenser's "Faerie Queene" is but Paul's armed Christian in the sixth chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians; that Pope's "Messiah" is but a paraphrase of prophetic and seraphic passages in Isaiah; that the noblest strains in Cowper's "Task" draw their inspiration and part of their imagery from the same rapt prophet; that the "Thanatopsis" of Bryant is but the expansion of a passage in Job; that Wordsworth's "Ode on Immortality" could never have been written but for Paul's fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians and the eighth chapter of Romans; that Shakespeare's conception of woman, of a Desdemona, and an Ophelia, would have been impossible had not his mind been permeated by a Bible and a Christian ideal. This suggestive thought could be much expanded; and these instructive illustrations might be greatly multiplied. The Bible gave all these men—working in differeht departments of genius—their inspiration. Shall we be so inconsistent as to rejoice in the streams while we despise the fountain whence they flowed?

The Bible has been a well of salvation to many an individual Christian. It was such to the eminent Francis Wayland during a period of serious illness. He said, "I have reason to bless God for setting me aside to read his Word, and call upon his name. I have read the Bible more than ever in my life in the same space of time; and at every new reading I find more to love and to admire." What wells of salvation the 23d Psalm and the 14th chapter of John have proved themselves to be! Who can write the history of those Scriptures? Thousands in glory will bless God that they were ever written. To almost all Christians some passage has proved to be a well of salvation. Dr. James Hamilton, illustrating the influence of single texts, says, "Suppose everyone were to mark in golden letters the text which has been the means of saving his soul. The Apostle Paul would mark the words, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' for it was these words spoken by Jesus from the dazzling light which made him a new creature. In the Bible of the Macedonian jailor the marked passage would be, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved'; for embracing this simple offer he rejoiced, believing in God with all this house. Martin Luther would print the text, 'The just shall live by faith,' in letters of gold. In the Bible of Bunyan the mark would be at, 'Yet there is room.' It was through the lattice of these words he first saw the Cross, and thought God had put them into the Bible to meet his case. And the Ironside soldier would indicate Eccl. 11: 9, for it was there which, but for the interposing Bible, would have pierced his breast; and when the battle was over, he read, 'Rejoice, O. young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways o thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.'"

The house of God, with its Sunday and week-day services, is a well of salvation. What a blessing is the Christian Sunday now, as was the Jewish Sabbath in ancient times! Happy is that land and blessed is that family where the Sabbath is kept holy, and God is loved and served! A week without Sunday is like a country without the fragrance of flowers or the song of birds. It is like a year without a summer, nothing but bleak, barren, frozen winter. It is like a night without a morning, nothing but sorrow, darkness, death. Sunday is the embarkment which God has built, against which the waves of care and sorrow, which for six long days have been rolling over the heads and hearts of anxious men and weary women, may break and then scatter themselves in harmless spray and beautiful foam. Sunday is God's Benediction on a Troubled World.

He stretches out mighty and loving hands over us, and the gentle benediction falls. He speaks the word of "Peace," and the voice of trade and strife ceases, the spindle rests in the loom, the grinding ceases in the mill, the store remains closed, and God's hush—making even silence vocal—alone is heard; and every heart is uplifted in holy song or bowed in humble prayer. Such is God's idea of Sunday; such should be ours. A period of rest for man and beast is an unavoidable necessity. Even if God had made no positive law on this subject, the necessities of the case would compel the observance of such periods.

To the laboring man Sunday is a boon and a benediction. Disraeli, in his "Tancred," well says: "Life and property in England, are protected by the laws of Sinai. The hard-working people of England are secured a day of rest in every week by the laws of Sinai." Humbolt, who certainly was a fair-minded witness, and who saw the working of the declinal system in France says: "The selection of one day in seven is the wisest that can be made. When in the time of the Revolution I spent some time in Paris I saw the institution of the Sabbath, despite its divine origin, suspended by the dry and decimal system. But this was decidedly too long. I am convinced that six days is the just measure. To lengthen the interval is as inhuman as it is foolish."

A Well of Longevity.

It has been abundantly proved by many actual tests that men and beasts will accomplish more in a year by obeying God in observing the Sabbath; and many men are now in lunatic asylums just because they disobeyed God by working on that day; failing to give their brain the rest it needed, they brought upon themselves inevitable punishment. No class of men are more interested in this subject than the laboring classes, so-called; and yet no class has shown greater blindness than the Sabbath-breakers among them to their own best interests. They are their own worst enemies. They are helping to work out their own ruin; if we change the holy-day into a holiday we shall soon have no rest day. In breaking God's law of the Sabbath they are also breaking his law of health in their own bodies. They are not reaping the benefit which this day of rest is designed to give them. Our hearts ache for their folly and mourn over their crime.

Many people are benefited in large measure by church-going who are not advantaged in the fullest measure possible. They are profited in their outward life and in the morals of the community. This is itself a great gain. Clean linen and one's best clothes are a means of grace. One is descending in the scale of humanity, he is getting further from the angelic end and near the devilish, who does not care enough for Sunday to fix up himself and his family on that day. He is the enemy of the Republic, he is the foe of humanity, he is a subverter of the social order, who lifts his hand or voice against God's holy day. Bad as many things are in social life they would be vastly worse were it not for the of the Sabbath and the sanctuary. We may now say, as Franklin said of his times: "If men are so bad with religion, what would they be without it!" Every business man knows that the morals inculcated in our churches tend greatly to restrain wickedness and to foster righteousness. Close all our churches today forever; let our ministers abandon the city, and real estate would not be worth much one year hence. Old Dr. South spoke the truth, when he said: "If there was not a minister in every parish, you would quickly find cause to increase the number of constables; if the churches were not employed to be places to hear God's law, there would be need of them to be prisons for the breakers of the laws of men."

The higher religious motive makes the obligation more binding. Here is the culminating point of all we have said. The will of God may be learned and the salvation of God found anywhere; but in his house, and in the preaching and hearing of his Word, we may come more immediately into his presence. We sometimes hear persons excuse themselves from the house of God on the ground that they can read a good sermon at home. As a rule, a sermon is the very last thing which such persons will read at home or elsewhere. But granting that they are perfectly honest, it would be better to hear the sermon. Even a poor sermon, when

of God in the heart of the preacher, becomes a tremendous power. A sermon needs a man behind it—a living, loving man—who is himself an incarnation of the truths he utters. The man is more than the preacher—certainly more than the sermon. There is a wonderful influence in the voice to arouse attention and to fix thought. Spurgeon's voice was a symphony; there was a melting pathos in it which mightily moved the hearer. A single sermon by an obscure and unknown man, who preached for the famous Edmund Calamy, was the means of the conversion of John Owen, who for five years was in deep despondency, and for three months scarcely spoke to any one. The text was, "Why are ye so fearful, oh, ye of little faith." The sermon was balm to the bruised heart; it proved to be his physical, mental and moral cure. Among the pupils of John Owen were John Locke and William Penn; his readers are almost all the English-speaking people; and eternity alone will reveal his work. A single sermon by Livingstone resulted in the conversion of at least five hundred, and originated a movement which extended through the West of Scotland and the North of Ireland, and thousands felt its influences. In an obscure corner of a humble chapel, there sat one Sunday morning, a young man burdened with a sense of sin. His heart was and peace. The preacher rose in the pulpit. He was a feeble looking man; he was a primitive Methodist. He was not learned, not eloquent, not famous. With a trembling voice he announced his text: "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else." He exalted Christ as the sinner's only refuge. As Moses lifted up the serpent, so he displayed Christ. The congregation was small. The eyes of the preacher seemed to rest upon the young man. Raising his voice he shouted, "Young man, look, look now!" It was the birth-moment of the new life. The young man looked and lived. With the look of faith came life. The burden fell from his heart. Joy filled his soul. He left the house justified. The humble preacher knew not, but God knew what glorious work was done that morning. That young man became a preacher whose fame has girdled the globe. The name of Charles Haddon Spurgeon—the greatest preacher since Paul's translation and who went a little while ago into the beatific Presence—is known throughout Christendom. The house of God was to him and millions more a well of salvation.

We observe, in the second place, that the water must be drawn from these wells. Men must realize their thirst. Except they feel their need they will not listen to the divine invitation: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." Hear, O men and women, this blessed invitation this morning. O come and drink and live now. Hear Christ again on the last great day of the feast as he stands and cries, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." A knowledge of the chemical constituents of bread is interesting and profitable; but that alone will not satisfy the wants of a hungry man. It is not enough that we know all about bread; he must eat the bread. It must be masticated and digested; it must be incorporated into his being, and thus be formed into blood and tissue. To know there is water in a distant well is good; but to quench the burning thirst must be drunk. I have read an incident of a soldier wounded in the battle of the Wilderness whose burning thirst caused greater suffering than his side torn by the shell. He moaned out piteously his desire for water; he waited long while the fever burned fiercely and no water was brought. Finally a canteen was brought and kind hands tenderly placed the water to his lips. But the glad expression of eye and face at the sight of the water soon changed to disappointment and agony. It was too late; the poor fellow could not swallow. Every effort to help him was quickly and tenderly made; but all to no purpose. Surely and swiftly death came on, and all his efforts and those of his friends were in vain. In this poor fellow's fate is seen a striking illustration of that deeper experience of the soul which thirsts and thirsts, but refuses the living water until all power to drink is gone, and spiritual death closes the terrible experience.

Through the prophet Jeremiah, God has said, "For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the Fountain of Living Waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water." God is here presented as the source of all good; and living water as the symbol of the highest good. Behold the inexplicable infatuation of the people! They have forsaken this fountain! And they continue to suffer from thirst which the world cannot quench. The world cannot supply the longing of an immortal soul. A living man needs the living God. Satan is a hard master. He leads his dupes away from fountains and gives in their place broken cisterns which can hold no water.

But, lastly, the drawing is to be made with joy. There is no joy like that which we may have in God. Never did even Satan invent a greater falsehood than when he represents true religion to be a life of gloom. Only the child of God can truly rejoice. There is joy in the discovery of this great salvation. This salvation is the result of the ripest thought of the great God; it is in the courts of heaven. It will fill the minds of saints and angels with themes of ineffable bliss throughout eternity. Compared with this all other joy is but sorrow, all other light is but darkness; all other bliss is but misery. There is also joy in accepting this Water of Life. It alone can satisfy. Finely did our Lord express this thought when speaking to the woman of Samaria of the water in Jacob's well as compared with the Living Water, he said, "whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." Speaking of drinking the natural water our Lord uses the present participle, suggesting repeated drinking from time to time; but when referring to the living water he uses a verb whose tense in Greek is employed of an act only once performed; because he that drinks even once of this wonderful water shall have all his wants fully supplied. Blessed be God, the heart finds its full satisfaction only in him! Only while resting on his bosom does the soul know full repose, unbroken peace and unending joy!

There is joy also in telling others of this living water. That joy fills my soul while I speak this morning. It was said that he who had never seen the joyous procession from the fountain of Siloam on the great day of the feast had never seen joy to the full. It is certain that he who has never led a soul to Christ knows nothing of the highest joy of which a human being is capable. Even angels rejoice over one sinner that repenteth. Oh the joy of those who could tell the dying Israelites of the healing serpent of brass. Look at those parents rushing hither and thither with their dying babes. Hasten to them. Tell them to look and live. They listen; they turn; they look; they live. See the mother's face now! Hear the father's words of gratitude and joy. This is joy indeed. Greater is the Christian's who turns even one sinner from the error of his ways and saves a soul from death. This is heaven on earth; this is kinship with angels; this is fellowship with Christ who for the joy set before him endured the Cross. Tell out the story; tell it always; tell it everywhere. Thank God, it never grows old; never can be exhausted.

AT EVENING TIME.

DEAR Lord, thy good and precious Book seems written all for me; Whenever I may open it, I find a word from thee.
My eyes are dim, but this one verse is pillow for the night—
Thy promise that at Evening-time it shall be surely light.

It was not always light with me; for many a sinful year
I walked in darkness, far from thee; but thou hast brought me near,
And washed me in thy precious blood, and taught me by thy grace,
And lifted up, on my poor soul, the brightness of thy face.

Thy Spirit shines upon thy Word, and makes it clear indeed;
Just like a shining lamp held up beside me as I read;
And brings it to my mind again alone upon my bed,
Till all abroad within my heart the love of God is shed.

I've nearly passed the shadows and the sorrows here below,
A little while—a little while, and he will come,
I know,
And take me to the glory that I think is very near,
When I shall see him face to face and his kind welcome hear.

And now my loving Jesus is my light at Eventide,
The welcome Guest that enters in forever to abide:
He never leaves me in the dark, but leads me all the way.—
So it is Light at Evening-time, and soon it will be Day.

SUNSET WITHOUT CLOUD.

WHEN life's brief day draws to a close,
And night brings forth its shroud;
Then faith shall triumph o'er all foes—
A sunset without cloud.

"There is no death!" my Saviour cries—
His cry is clear and loud;
"There is no death!" my soul replies,
"But sunset without cloud."

GRUMBLERS.

BY REV. C. H. MEAD.

TO some people, discontent is comfort, while happiness is a source of misery. They delight in shadow, revel in gloom, and collapse in sunshine. A cheerful Christianity grieves them, while they exult in a long face and a solemn voice. A hymn of praise grates, but a groan gladdens. They love the cloud, but draw the line at the silver lining. They live to grumble and would die if they couldn't. Preacher and sermon, sexton and fire, deacon and collection-box, all are legitimate objects for them to grumble about. They grumble at creation putting small hickory nuts on strong trees, and big pumpkins on weak vines. They delight in calling themselves, "poor, weak worms of the dust," and will tell you they know religion is good "by sad experience." They live in Grumbling Street and have no use for those who dwell on Thanksgiving Avenue. The eagle, soaring away towards the sun, they regard as a feathered monstrosity, but a croaking raven is a bird of paradise. Oh, Grumbler—in the church and out of it—you have your mission, I suppose, but I would that mission were ended. I was sailing up the St. John's River, Florida, one March day—and the Creator never made a finer one. The sun was shining, the air was balmy, the sweet perfume of orange blossoms and flowers was wafted on every breeze—and the scenery was glorious. It was a day when you felt like leaping, dancing and crying out with exuberance. I had no acquaintance on the coast, yet felt I must talk to some one. I saw a man standing near the railing on the upper deck, apparently enjoying the beauty and glory of the scene. He seemed to be alone. I said to myself "that man is in the same box I am—anway he is in the same boat—I'll speak to him." Going up to him, I said, "Isn't this a glorious day?" He turned around to me a face that resembled a tomb-stone, and with a voice as solemn as one from the grave he said,

"What did you say, sir?"

"I said this is a glorious day."

"Well, it dont't make any difference, it will rain to-morrow, and don't you forget it."

I gave him a wide berth, for he was worse than a child. The next day, going out on the verandah of the hotel at Sandford, to find as glorious a day as the one that preceded, I suddenly came face to face with that tomb-stone. I stopped and said,

"You said it was going to rain to-day, but it does not."

"It don't make any difference," he replied, "it will rain to-morrow."

I left him, still looking for rain. Taking the cars the next day for Orlando, before we got half way there, the rain began pouring down. On reaching Orlando, I took the 'bus for the hotel, and on reaching it, I sprang out, rushed into the door of the hotel and right into the arms of the miserable fellow, who had got there one train ahead of me. The moment he discovered whom he had got in his arms, he burst out laughing, and said gleefully. "Didn't I tell you it was going to rain to-day—didn't I tell you?"

He was the happiest man in the hotel that day, for he had found what he had been looking for.

I went into a house not long since and found a widow. The graveyard held most of those who were nearest and dearest to her in this world. She and poverty had been close neighbors for many a day, and many there were who looked on her as an object of pity. Ah, she was in splendid shape and circumstances to grumble—but she didn't. With Jacob of old she might have said, "all these things are against me," but she didn't. Her home, poor as it was, was on Thanksgiving Avenue, and she was too full of praise to find time to grumble. I found her with "the Book of Books" opened on her knee, and her face fairly shone as she read:

"I will bless the Lord at all times; his praise shall continually be in my mouth. My soul shall make her boast in the Lord; the humble shall hear thereof and be glad. O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together. Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all."

It was a benediction to visit a home like that, and one such saint is worth more than all the grumblers in the universe. To all grumblers who read this, I advise them to go to the home of that poor widow and hear her sing, as I did,

Simply trusting every day,
Trusting thro' a stormy way;
Even when my faith is small,
Trusting Jesus, that is all.

Singing, if my way is clear;
Praying, if the path is drear;
If in danger, for him call:
Trusting Jesus that is all.

A HELPFUL GOSPEL.

THE great want of the world to-day is the fulfilment of the Christ-like injunction, that which he promulgated in his sermon Olivetic. All the political economists under the archivolt of the heavens in convention for a thousand years cannot settle this controversy between monopoly and hard work, between capital and labor. During the Revolutionary War there was a heavy piece of timber to be lifted, perhaps for some fortress, and a corporal was overseeing the work, and he was giving commands to some soldiers as they lifted: "Heave away, there! yo heave!" Well, the timber was too heavy; they could not get it up. There was a gentleman riding by on a horse, and he stopped and said to this corporal, "Why don't you help them lift? That timber is too heavy for them to lift" "No," he said, "I won't; I am a corporal." The gentleman got off his horse and came up to the place. "Now," he said to the soldiers, "all together—yo, heave!" and the timber went to its place. "Now," said the gentleman to the corporal, "when you have a piece of timber too heavy for the men to lift, and you want help, you send to your commander-in-chief." It was Washington. Now, that is about all the Gospel I know—the Gospel of giving somebody a lift, a lift out of darkness, a lift out of earth into heaven. That is all the Gospel I know—the Gospel of helping somebody else to lift.

"Oh," says some wiseacre, "talk as you will, the law of demand and supply will regulate these things until the end of time." No, they will not, unless God dies and the batteries of the Judgment Day are spiked, and Pluto and Proserpine, king and queen of the infernal regions, take full possession of this world.

Do you know who Supply and Demand are? They have gone into partnership, and they propose to swindle this earth and are swindling it. You are drowning. Supply and Demand stand on the shore, one on one side, the other on the other side, of the life-boat, and they cry out to you, "Now, you pay us what we ask you for getting you to shore, or go to the bottom!" If you can borrow $5,000 you can keep from failing in [illegible] "Now, you pay us exorbitant usury, or you go into bankruptcy." This robber firm of Supply and Demand say to you: "The crops are short. We bought up all the wheat and it is in our bin. Now, you pay our price or starve." That is your magnificent law of supply and demand.

Supply and Demand own the largest mill on earth and all the rivers roll over their wheel, and into their hopper they put all the men, women and children they can shovel out of the centuries, and the blood and the bones redden the valley while the mill grinds. The diabolic law of supply and demand will yet have to stand aside, and instead thereof will come the law of love, the law of co-operation, the law of kindness, the law of sympathy, the law of Christ.

CHRISTIANITY NOT DEAD.

LET us see whether the church of God is in a Bull Run retreat, muskets, canteens, and haversacks strewing all the way. The great English historian, Sharon Turner, a man of vast learning and of great accuracy, not a clergyman but an attorney as well as a historian, gives this overwhelming statistic in regard to Christianity and in regard to the number of Christians in the different centuries. In the first century, 500,000 Christians; in the second century, 2,000,000 Christians; in the third century, 5,000,000 Christians; in the fourth century, 10,000,000 Christians; in the fifth century, 15,000,000 Christians; in the sixth century, 20,000,000 Christians; in the seventh century, 24,000,000 Christians; in the eighth century, 30,000,000 Christians; in the ninth century, 40,000,000 Christians; in the tenth century, 50,000,000 Christians; in the eleventh century, 70,000,000 Christians; in the twelfth century, 80,000,000 Christians; in the thirteenth century, 75,000,000 Christians; in the fourteenth century, 80,000,000 Christians; in the fifteenth century, 100,000,000 Christians; in the sixteenth century, 125,000,000 Christians; in the seventeenth century, 155,000,000 Christians; in the eighteenth century, 200,000,000 Christians—a decadence, as you observe, in only one century, and more than made up in the following centuries, while it is the usual computation that there will be, when the record of the nineteenth century is made up, at least 300,000,000 Christians.

Poor Christianity! what a pity it has no friends. How lonesome it must be. Who will take it out of the poor-house? Poor Christianity! Three hundred millions in one century. In a few weeks of last year 100,000 copies of the Oxford Bible distributed through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Why the earth is like an old castle with twenty gates and a park of artillery ready to thunder down every gate.

Lay aside all Christendom and see how heathendom is being surrounded and honeycombed and attacked by this all-conquering Gospel. At the beginning of this century there were only 150 missionaries; now there are 25,000 missionaries and native helpers and evangelists. At the beginning of this century there were only 50,000 heathen converts; now there are 1,650,000 converts from heathendom. There is not a seacoast on the planet out the battery of the Gospel is planted and ready to march on, north, south, east, west.

LOST OPPORTUNITIES

IT is not a question of very much interest to us how long the world is going to last. We will have no discussion with the geologist concerning this. The question that most thoroughly interests us is, How soon will our connection with this world probably cease? Though it should last ten thousand years after we have gone, it will make no difference to us. The average of human life is less than fifteen years. All those who come beyond fifteen years have come to it only by careful nursing and watching on the part of parents, and perhaps some care on their own part. Having passed fifteen years, every step we take subtracts from the probability that we will continue much longer. The vast majority of the human race die in infancy; only a few come up to the point to which we have attained, and if a man can run the gauntlet of diseases and accidents, and come to fifty or sixty years of age, he is a real hero worthy of a palm.

We are coming near the terminus of our opportunities of doing good. Have you ever observed the fact that we are constantly breaking away from old associations, and making other acquaintances? For a little while we move in one circle; four or five years pass, and we work in another circle. You are under very different circumstances now from what you were ten or twenty years ago. Five or ten years from now, you will be in different circumstances from what you are now; perhaps more prospered, perhaps more troubled. But as these associations are changing, we are losing our opportunities of influencing the present circle; and if we fail to do our duty now, however humbly we may repent of neglects in the future, we cannot get back our opportunities. The day will have passed. There are people whom we might, perhaps, have brought to the Lord Jesus Christ fifteen years ago, over whom we exerted no beneficial influence.

God put us in those places to see whether we would be faithful. We had every inducement to lead an earnest and useful life where we were then placed. We have neglected our duty—we have missed our opportunity; and forever and forever that work which we ought to have done will remain undone. Now, the question is whether, having around us a circle of associates whom we may influence, we will neglect to exert upon those associations the power of Christian example and Christian exhortation, and to pass on to some other sphere with our work undone. If we have half a dozen trains starting between now and the time when we must go to meet some engagement, we are not particular which train we take; but if we feel it is the last train, how very earnest we are in the matter of getting to the depot.

Every hour of our lives there is a last train: the going of Christian opportunities which will never, never come back. Indeed all our opportunities of usefulness are going away. You are having less physical strength—perhaps less mental strength—than you once had. You will have still less in the future. The people with whom you now meet, you will never meet again. The people with whom you come in contact in business circles during the approaching week, you will meet perhaps for the last time. "The fields all around us are white to the harvest." The Gospel sickle is ready, the wages are large, and Jesus asks us to go into the harvest fields and bind a few sheaves for the heavenly garner.

GRINDSTONES

LET us employ the world's grindstones. We will listen to the world's music, and we will watch its acumen, and we will use its grind-stones, and will borrow its philosophical apparatus to make our experiments, and we will borrow its printing-presses to publish our Bibles, and we will borrow its rail-trains to carry our Christian literature, and we will borrow its ships to transport our missionaries.

We all have tools of Christian power. Do not let them lose their edges. We want no rusty blades. We want no coulter that cannot rip up the glebe. We want no axe that cannot fell the trees. We want no goad that cannot start the lazy team. Let us get the very best grindstones we can find, though they be in possession of the Philistines, compelling them to turn the crank while we bear down with all our might on the swift revolving wheel, until all our energies and faculties shall be brought up to a bright, keen, sharp, glittering edge.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

GOOD WOMEN.

I REMEMBER, while in the west preaching, a fine girl came to me and asked certain questions. A young man was visiting her frequently. They were not engaged, but no one could tell what might happen any minute: and she had her suspicions aroused concerning his evenings, and where he spent them, when not with her. I told her she had a right to know, and informed her how she could find out, in a perfectly legitimate manner. She learned her suspicions were correct, and that he visited pool-rooms, gambling dens and questionable places.

He got, one morning, amongst the heavy mail for the concern for which he worked, a dainty envelope, addressed to himself; he knew its source, and stuck it away for a happy reading alone. He opened it and read:

"Mr. B——, Dear Sir,—So long as you frequent such places as you do, when not with me, you need not call.

"Yours respectfully, F. J.——,"

My! but didn't he swear! Who had been telling on him. "How had she found out?" he stormed.

How? Well, dear reader, maybe you would like to know, and I'll tell you. She simply asked a friend of hers, whose husband knew the young man, and he readily found out the facts, told his wife, and she told the the girl. Simple enough.

Well, it took him a few weeks to get over his huff, then he broke away from all vice, became a man, and now two hearts beat as one. They are married, and she has a good husband and a good home; which she never would have had except for the rule, "Keep good company."

Wives.

Wives are of two classes. Good wives, and good-for-nothing wives.

To describe the first is not hard; above all things, she is "prudent," and it's no wonder the Bible declares, such an one is from the Lord. Of the other class, whether they are from the devil or not, I cannot say: but that they send many a man that way is certain.

It may as well be known here, and now, that I'm dead set against bachelors and bachelors' clubs. As it's the duty of busines to tie men up to work, and the duty of legislation to tie men up to law; so, as a minister, I think its my duty to tie men up to women.

I'd slip a good wife in between every mariageable man and his apartments, if I could, just to upset his notions of single blessedness, by a heavy dose of double happiness. Men were never made to remain single—neither were women. They ought to get married. A man gets more than a wife in matrimony.

What saith the Scriptures—"whoso findeth a wife, findeth a good thing, and obtaineth favor of the Lord." There is favor in heaven, poured out on husbands, that bachelors never get.

They get a home; and there is as much difference between a home and a house, as there is between an ox and an ass.

The world needs homes; and a good wife is a home-maker.

It takes a heap of heaven to make a good woman, and more needs to be added to make a good wife.

In stepping from womanhood to wifehood, a bridge is crossed; and too often it is the bridge of sighs, like the one of history. This should not be, but often it is her own fault. Let me tell you why. First, because she breaks the laws so clearly named for her happiness, in II. Corinthians 6.

"Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers."

Let Christian girls marry Christian men. This marrying men with the hope of getting them converted afterward, is sad folly.

The question is asked, "What shall a Christian woman do who is already engaged to a man who is not a Christian?"

I answer, marry him, for God is not pleased with broken vows; but be sure to set the wedding day beyond that hour when he gives himself to Christ.

Next week I will tell you how a good Christian girl in New Jersey acted in a case of that kind and the result of the action.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

IN THE CAUCASUS.

EUROPEAN statesmen apprehensive that the long expected outbreak of war cannot be much longer delayed have become interested about a district which is little known to ordinary travelers. It is that portion of Armenia abutting on the territories of Russia, Turkey and Persia. A portion of that district is shown in the illustration on this page. It is especially interesting to Bible students from the fact that in it is situated Mount Ararat on which according to the Biblical account, Noah's ark rested after the Deluge. The reason for the new political interest manifested in this section is disclosed in the report of a traveler who recently explored the district. He found that, although the Congress of Berlin assigned the mountains, of which Ararat is one, as the southern boundary of Russian territory, the country for miles to the south of the mountains is now completely Russianized. When he was there a few years ago, it was held by tribal chiefs who though nominally the subjects of the Sultan were practically independent and were continually at war with each other. Now, they wear Russian uniforms, call the Czar their master and boast that they are under his protection. In this way, Russia has gained possession of the district without fighting and without getting the consent of her rivals. Many a man has been captured by the enemy of souls with similar tactics. None fall so easy a prey to him as they who claim independence, are quarrelsome and disdain to call Christ their Lord. (II. Timothy 3: 2-5.)

An Unconscious Heir.

A YOUNG man was released from prison at Atlanta, Ga., recently, for whom the police are now looking eagerly. He went to Atlanta from Charleston, S. C. He was unable to obtain employment and soon spent all the money he had. Without occupation or friends, he sank into hopeless poverty and gradually dropped into evil ways of life. Eventually he was arrested for loitering and was sent to the stockade. At the end of his term he was liberated with a hint that he would be wise in avoiding Atlanta in the future. He wandered away disconsolately looking in his ragged clothes the picture of misery. Where he went is unknown, but he is probably tramping the country and supporting himself by begging. Shortly after his departure, an Atlanta newspaper, containing an account of his arrest and imprisonment, fell into the hands of his father, who is one of the old aristocracy of South Carolina. He immediately wrote to the prison asking to have his son released and sent to him. But the young man was already gone, and he was informed of the fact. Then he wrote again, giving his story. His son had run away from home, but his family were ready to forgive him and welcome him back. Since he ran away he had become heir to a share in a large property worth over half a million dollars, but he did not know of it, and the father begged the police to find him and tell him. A similar duty is entrusted to every Christian. They are to find the wanderers who may become heirs of heaven and tell them that their Father is awaiting to receive them and forgive them, and give them an eternal inheritance. (Hosea 14: 4.)

A Demented Anarchist.

SOME excitement was caused on the East side of New York on Feb. 22, by the screams of a half-dressed woman, who ran through the streets crying out that she had been poisoned and begging to be saved from death. She was taken to a police station and thence to Bellevue Hospital, where it was found that her reason was unbalanced. Inquiries about her, elicited the fact that she was a native of Poland, where her family hold a high position. She studied in a college at Suvalk, but the Russian government closed the institution. She then went to Vienna to study medicine, and afterward to Paris to complete her studies and get a diploma as a physician. Subsequently she left the French capital and came to New York. Here she met an old friend, who had been a fellow-student with her at Suvalk, and the two ladies went to the hospitals in company. She did not see much of her friend afterward, but made the acquaintance of Russian anarchists in New York and lived among them, serving them in a medical capacity and helping them with money. She was much distressed by the news that President Harrison had concluded a treaty with Russia for the surrender of certain Russian subjects, who have found a refuge on our shores. She feared that she would be one of those to be given up, and when she learned that the Senate had confirmed the treaty, her terror drove her crazy. There was probably little danger of her being given up. Had she known more about the power and disposition of our Government, she would have had more confidence in it. The same may be said of some Christians of weak faith who, having trusted in Christ, fear that, nevertheless, their souls may be lost. The fear in that case is certainly groundless. No one is strong enough to wrest them from his hand. (John 10: 28.)

Lost in the Blizzard.

A YOUNG man had a narrow escape from death, near Middletown, N. Y., on February 22d. A farmer living near that town was awakened soon after midnight by the fierce blizzard which swept across the country. The roar of the wind kept him awake, and at last he rose and went to the window. In a lull of the storm he fancied that he heard a faint cry for help. It was repeated and then the farmer was sure. He dressed and went out. He searched as well as he could in the darkness, but could see no one. The cries, however, continued, and they sounded strangely muffled. Guided by them the farmer came to his well. Letting the light of the lantern fall into it, he made out the figure of a man clinging to the stones, just above the water, twenty feet below. He lowered the bucket, and called to the man to cling to it. In a few moments the man came to the surface and fell numbed and exhausted on the snow. The farmer took him into the house, administered restoratives and soon had him out of danger. The young man said he was lost in the storm, and coming to the curb that surrounded the well, he supposed it to be a fence, and climbing over it fell to the bottom. He was unhurt and climbed out of the water by clinging to the projecting stones in the side of the well, and had been shouting for help a long time when the farmer heard him and came to the rescue. It was a narrow escape. If it had not happened that the farmer was wakeful and sufficiently humane to go to his assistance he would have frozen to death. There are times in the Christian's life when he has as much reason to be thankful that his cry for help reaches the ear of One who never slumbers and who is ready to deliver him. (Psalm 145: 19.)

A Proof of Kinship.

AMONG the incidents which have come to light since the death of Justice Lamar of the Supreme Court is one that is related by Judge Wharton, of Jackson, Miss. He says that while Lamar was United States Senator he had the privilege of entertaining him at his house on some occasion which brought the distinguished statesman into that neighborhood. In the course of the evening an old lady, very shabbily dressed, came to the house and asked to see Senator Lamar. Judge Wharton, wishing to save his guest annoyance, went out and inquired her business. She said she merely wished to see the Senator as he was her cousin. He returned and related what she had said. Lamar said that he would see the old lady, although he had no cousins that he knew of in that neighborhood. She was ushered in and was some time in conversation with the Senator. After she was gone he said she had convinced him of her relationship. There was no doubt of the family traits. "She has the family pride all over her," he said; "she is as poor as she can be, but she will not accept any assistance. She scorns it. It's a family failing. We are all alike." The old lady's pride was more obvious than her wisdom. It would probably have afforded the Senator pleasure to have made her last days more comfortable, but pride stood in the way as it does sometimes in the way of greater blessings. There are numbers who would be saved if they could earn salvation but who will not accept it as a free gift. (Eph. 2: 8.)

A RUSSIAN CAMP IN THE SHADOW OF MOUNT ARARAT.

Deluded Pilgrims.

SEVEN car-loads of colored people passed through Atlanta, Ga. on Feb. 17, on their way from Arkansas to Brunswick. There were over four hundred of them, the majority being old men, women and children. There were very few able-bodied men in the number. They told the trainmen that they expected to find a ship awaiting them at Brunswick in which they would be taken to Africa. They were penniless, but they had been assured by the men who had organized the exodus, that the Lord would feed and care for them as he did for the Hebrews in going through the desert to the Promised Land. The white people in their own county had called them together and warned them that they were being deceived, but the negroes had refused to listen to the warning. They had sold or given away their poor belongings and started for the Paradise that had been described to them. There they would not have to work any more and they would meet their ancestors who died centuries ago. On the train they sang hymns and prayed continually and were in a state of high excitement. It is sad to think what their disappointment would be, on their arrival at Brunswick, to find no ship waiting for them and no means of reaching the Paradise they were looking for. It may be hoped that their disappointment will not shake their faith in all encouragements to seek a better land. A better Paradise than any earthly one is provided for all who through faith in Christ become fit for its possession. (Heb. 11: 16.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Thomas Harrison will commence a revival campaign in Dr. Talmage's Brooklyn Tabernacle on Good Friday, March 31.

During the year 1802 the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting received requests for prayer to the number of 8,755 and the attendance at the noon service for the year was 13,226.

The marriage ring of Luther's wife has been discovered at Ainna, Coburg, where a family has possessed it for a number of generations without knowing its interesting history.

Evangelist Arthur Crane, of Saco, Me., has just completed a series of services at Riverside Baptist Church, New York, which have been much blessed in the quickening of the church and in conversions.

Rev. Charles Herald, who has done most successful work at Bethesda Chapel, Brooklyn, N. Y., has been holding meetings in the People's Church, Chicago, with which he was identified before entering the ministry.

Rev. B. Fay Mills commences this week the great work in St. Paul and Minneapolis. All the evangelical churches in the two cities have been holding meetings for prayer and for the training of the choir for some time past. A great harvest of souls is confidently expected.

Nearly six hundred shares of stock have already been subscribed toward liquidating the debt on Mr. Philip J. Quinn's Anti-gambling car Roanoke, a picture of which was published in this journal on Nov. 16, 1892. The subscribers are in New York, New Jersey and Illinois.

The special meetings at Des Moines, Ia., commenced after Rev. B. Fay Mills left the city are still continued with excellent results. Large numbers of those who signed the cards under Mr. Mills's preaching have been led to Christ. The number of cards signed was over three thousand.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services at Worcester, Mass., have been much blessed. The Telegram of that city says that fully 2,100 ladies were present in Piedmont Church at the meeting for ladies only. Simultaneous meetings have been held in the Main Street Church, Bethany Church and the Church of Christ.

A revival which commenced with the week of prayer is in progress in Southington, Conn. Rev. E. E. Davidson, of Newtonville, Mass., has just concluded a two weeks' series of union meetings, which have profoundly affected the churches and the town. More than one hundred have expressed their purpose to lead a new life, two-thirds of whom are adults.

A musical entertainment will be given this (Wednesday) evening at Chickering Hall, New York, in aid of the proposed institute for the benefit of the blind, which is to be erected at Hartford, Conn. Its design is to give such an education to blind persons as will enable them to be self-supporting. It is promoted by Mr. F. E. Cleaveland of Hartford, who, although blind, is well known as a successful lawyer.

A remarkable season of blessing has been experienced during the past few weeks at Mrs. Naylor's Berachah Mission in West Thirty-second Street, New York. No less than seventy persons of various nationalities have made confession of Christ as a result of the meetings. A great deal of philanthropic work is done at the Mission and this is still continued in spite of the straitened circumstances resulting from Mr. Henry Naylor's death.

The Mid-winter Convention usually held by the Beacon Hill Church, Boston, Mass., early in the year was omitted this year. Instead, an all-day service in memory of the sainted Dr. Charles Cullis was held in the church. Drs. A. J. Gordon, Daniel Steele, D. F. Lamson, F. D. Sanford and many other eminent clergymen took part in the services and spoke of the benefits derived by the church at large from Dr. Cullis's consecrated life.

Miss Clara Barton, the President of the Red Cross Society has received on behalf of the Society a gift of 782 acres of land in the Blue Grass region on the Kentucky border of Indiana. It comprises a village, a post-office, tenant houses, barns, orchards, groves of maple and quarries of stone. It is presented as "a thank-offering to humanity," by Dr. Joseph Gardner of Bedford, Ind., and is to be used as the head-quarters of the Red Cross Society.

CHAPTER II.

FELLOW VOYAGERS

WHEN the tide had become the anxious yet hopeful watchers on the ship far beyond the possibility of descrying the faces or even forms of the equally anxious but less hopeful watchers on the shore; when even the spires of Limerick and the grey towers of its hoary castle were being hidden in the distant haze; when the banks of the Shannon were lost to sight and the green fields and purple slopes of "dear ould Ireland" were all blent in one barely distinguishable line of coast, then, and not till then, did our little band of voyagers forbear to gaze on the land they loved, which was never to be looked upon by their eyes again.

Then the spell was broken; the feeling which had made speech impossible, and which, till now, could find no expression but through the tearful eyes and that "expressive silence" which is so much more eloquent than speech, fount vent; and once again, Adieus were waved, "Good-byes" were flung out for the winds to carry to the "folks at home;" and the impulsive, excitable and tender-hearted children of Erin gave loud utterance to their love and sorrow in many a sigh or sob or sound or sentence that might lift a little the weight that lay heavy on their heart.

> We're bidding you a long farewell,
> Dear hearts, so kind and true;
> But still we'll love, and love you well
> In the land we're going to.
> They say there's bread and work for all,
> And the sun shines always there;
> But we'll not forget old Ireland
> Were it fifty times as fair!
> Good-bye, dear hearts; our God is yours;
> And down from yonder blue;
> The loving Eye that looks on us
> Will still look down on you!

These pleasant strains uprising from a woman's voice, notably clear, and strong, and sweet, fell upon the sorrowing band like the flash of a talisman, or the sound of magic bells. The sobs and sighs were hushed, the "words of nature's plaint" were silenced. "Thrue for you, Misthress Heck! an' God bless you!" came like a chorus from the lips of the listeners. So soon had Brave Barbara found her place and begun her mission, "King's daughter" as she was—her mission of providing strength, and cheer, and comfort in the "cloudy and dark day," the hours of test, and stress, and strain. No wonder that Paul Heck, the strapping and manly young man who called her wife, bent his calm, gray eyes upon her where she sat, and smiled a telegram which told her that he loved her well.

Philip Embury, the leader of the little band of emigrants, was much occupied in tenderly caring for his young bride, who had already begun to feel the unhappy and painful symptoms which make one's first experiences of a "life on the ocean wave" so unpoetical and unromantic. He had only just brought her from the home-nest, and like the true man he was, he was minded to do love's fullest duty to the fledgling committed to his care.

Mary Embury was not yet out of her teens, a girl-wife whose great beauty both of face and character were the admiration of all; who was beloved of all, and especially by the strong, good and somewhat staid Philip, who was full ten years her senior; and by whose homely but intelligent gospel ministrations she had been brought into the bonds of a still closer union that of Christ the Lord.

Between the youthful Mary and Barbara Heck, who was several years her senior there existed a strong, deep, intimate friendship which dated from the days of Mary's earliest girlhood and which grew with her years and strengthened with her strength. It may be well doubted whether Philip Embury, close as the tie that bound them, could have induced his youthful bride to adventure a sea voyage and the fortunes of an emigrant's life, but for the fact that Barbara was to be her comrade across the watery waste, her neighbor in the new home they hoped to raise for themselves amid the fertile valleys of the Western world.

"Do you repent leaving your dear old home, darling?" said Philip, as he held his ailing bride on his supporting arm. Perhaps there was more than a shade of anxious question in his voice, a certain underwave of doubt as to whether he had done well to link the fortunes of one so young, so fair, to the rugged life and formidable enterprise involved in his own. His fears on that head, if he had any, were soon effectually dispelled.

The very putting of the question did her good service, for it served to bring about that change of thought and revulsion of feeling that banished the evil spirit of the seasickness from its distressing supremacy.

"Repent, Philip? No, indeed," said Mary, with a smile on her pale face, and a light in her brown eyes that gave sufficient reply. "I suppose life wouldn't be possible without a heart, would it? Things would soon come to a poor pass if one hadn't an engine to keep the works a-going. Well, you've got mine, you know, in your own keeping, and to leave you to carry it off alone would be an act of suicide. No, no," she continued, glad to see that she had chased the cloud from the brow of her beloved, and speaking with a voice full of feeling, "I go where my heart is. Come weal, come woe, it will be weal to me where my Philip is. 'Where thou goest I will go. Thy God shall be my God, and nothing but death shall part thee and me!'"

Then the happy Philip was himself again, and all his sky was without a cloud. Well, well, it was better so; better that they should not see in the far, far west yonder a cloud no bigger than a man's hand, and that a time may come when—but hold! The veil that covers to us the face of futurity is the hand of mercy; if it lift on darkness it shall not lessen the brightness of to-day; if it lift on light, the light shall be fairer for the darkness that intervened. Let us say with Alexander Pope;

> O blindness to the future! kindly giv'n,
> That each may fill the circle marked by heaven.

Among that little batch of emigrants who sailed in the Colleen Bawn was a brother of Barbara Heck, who, after the fashion of his Moravian progenitors, rejoiced in the possession of a scriptural first-name, and was in many respects, especially in his impulsivenes and lamentable want of faith and confidence, the exact counter-part of his namesake, the Peter, who at one time lopped off an ear from the head of a person he objected to; at another, came off second best in an altercation with a servant maid. and on another, in an unwonted fit of over-confidence, was like enough to have been drowned.

These hints may well stand for a portrait of honest, vacillating, headstrong, blundering, Peter Rechel, who in most things was brother to Barbara in nothing but by the blood in his veins and the love in his heart. It will be remembered that the other Peter did not turn out much of a failure after all; and I for one, as I look at the round-faced burly, good-humored, short-tempered Peter Rechel, am inclined to pin my faith to him and to say, "Let those who watch him wait and see."

Of some others who were making the voyage on the Colleen Bawn on that historic occasion, I may have to make further mention in subsequent pages; the two elder brothers of Philip Embury, for instance, Thomas and William, together with their wives and families, who were transferring considerable proceeds of former crops and goods and gear to the New World with a view to purchase farms already cleared and under tillage. There were the Dalmages, too, and the Morgans, of Ballyandra; there were Simon Sweitzer and his kin; he had married a sister of the Emburys; there were others also whose names I have not space to mention, but all, or nearly all, who had found in the Colleen Bawn a temporary "home on the rolling deep," were more or less related to the Emburys, Hecks, and Sweitzers, or, at least, were life-long neighbors in the little Irish village of Ballingarane and the hamlets near by.

There is one other of these adventurous pilgrims, however, of whom I must make special mention, asking pardon of his astral personality for not having taken note of him before. Casting our eye backward to scan the deck of the Colleen Bawn, as she boldly ploughed the waves, with the shores of ould Ireland on her lee, we shall not fail to note the presence of Michael Finnigan, known through all the region round about Balligarane, Courtimatrix, and Killeheen, as "Onlucky Mike." Mike was a capital specimen of the Irish peasant "ne'er-do-weel," whose unkempt locks, audacious air ludicrously composite attire and homely mother-wit, are only to be smiled at, or excused under the supposition that the "gossoon," "bouchaleen," or whatever he may be called by good-tempered neighbors, is "a bit queer, you know," "a thrifle deficient," or, "not quite right in his head.

But how did this half-wild human waif come to be a passenger, and partly a comrade, with those who sailed in the Colleen Bawn? It seems that some four or five years ago, "Onlucky Mike" was prowling after food, hunting for a casual supper, in the neighborhood of Balligarane. Passing the homestead of the Rechels a little before dark, he saw the front door open; and from thence, and through the undraped window, the fire light shone invitingly. Mike saw the table set for supper, saw a pile of loaves of barley-bread, saw a cut of toothsome-looking cheese, and a pitcher of butter-milk—all awaiting swift consumption. There was nobody in the kitchen; the coast was clear, and Mike, close driven by that sternest of all hunters, Hunger, made an instant raid on the tempting viands. To quench his thirst by a strong pull at the butter-milk was the work of an instant; to devour one of the barley-loaves was the work of another—hunger has sharp teeth and works quickly—and to place another under his arm for slower consumption in the fields, completed the sum of his depredations.

But, alas, for "Onlucky Mike," he had scarcely reached the door when he was met by Peter Rechel, who was coming in to supper from the field, almost as hungry and a good deal more tired than Mike himself. In a moment, Peter, treating the young thief in much the same spirit as his great namesake treated Malchus, caught him by the ear and began to cuff him soundly, and tell him at the same time, with the rough side of his tongue, what the constable, the magistrate, the jailer, and other awful people, should do to him.

Poor Mike could stand the cuffing, he was accustomed to it; but as he saw the handcuffs and the jail looming in the distance, his courage collapsed and he lifted up his voice with strength! Suddenly the arm of Peter Rechel was gripped by his sister Barbara, the judicial blows ceased to fall, the imprisoned ear was loosened from the vice-like pinch that held it, and Michael, held in durance only by Barbara's hand which clasped his dingy fingers, looked at her and smiled through his tears and vowed by the bones of St. Patrick that he would not run away. Peter told his sister, hotly, the whole story of the larceny the young sinner had committed, waxing hotter as his wrath brimmed up again.

"The young thief o' the world!" said he. "You that's the night-bird wi' the crooked claws! Now shall ye have your wings clipped, and your hair, forsooth, with the prison shears!"

Again he assayed to use the cuffing process, but the capable Barbara kept the angry man at bay, and "Onlucky Mike" took shelter behind her and clung to her skirts; for the very mention of the word "prison" filled him with affright. In vain Barbara pleaded for mercy. Mike had been a sinner aforetime and must now suffer for his misdeeds.

"I'll take him to Court-Matrick this minute," said Peter, "that is, as soon as I get my supper done. Sit down in that corner!" he continued, turning to the trembling Mike, "and don't stir for your life or it will be the worse for you!"

Mike looked up the kindly eyes of the maiden, and when she nodded acquiescence he took the place and posture indicated; looking out from beneath his tangled hair, all the while, upon the young lady whom he felt to be his friend. Her brother passed into a back kitchen to remove the soil from his hands before he began supper. Barbara quietly crossed over to Mike's corner. "Mike," she whispered, "when you are hungry come to me. Don't steal any more: will you promise?"

"Ay, that will I, an' may the—" began Mike, all his big Irish heart welling into his eyes, but he was checked by Barbara, who laid her hand on his frowsy head.

"Hush!" said she, "that'll do. I believe you without an oath. You had better go now," she continued, handing him the loaf which had fallen in his tustle with her irate brother. "God bless you. Ask him to keep you honest."

Here she heard the sound of footsteps; beckoning him to follow, she opened wide the door, and in an instant Mike passed by her, kissing the skirt of her dress, ere he shot across the threshold, through the little farmyard, and across the open fields long before the unsuspecting Peter had discovered that his prisoner was gone!

From that day forward, "Onlucky Mike" had been Barbara's voluntary bond slave. It seemed as though he was never out of reach, and though often out of her sight being fearful to intrude, seemed to be ever within call. His greatest joy was to do her bidding; for her he would fetch and carry like a dog. The compassionate maiden tried to teach him to read, to understand something about Jesus, duty, heaven. Her success was not great on these lines. It seemed enough for Mike that she held to him, stood by him, and was kind to him, though most others had little else for him but rough words and ready blows

When Mike discovered that his liege lady was going across the "big salt say," he was distressed beyond measure, and utterly inconsolable. Suddenly, seeing how it troubled her, he tried his tears, became his blithe and wayward self again and Barbara could not help thinking, with a sigh that the old proverb that "hot love is soon cold" was about to be proven true once again. But the depth and strength of "Onlucky Mike's" devotion was vastly underrated.

All unnoticed and unsuspected Mike set himself to discover the time, the place, the ship, the captain—all that could be known of his idol's embarkation for a foreign land. He forced an interview with Captain O'Connor, choosing his time well and wisely. When that genial skipper was sitting in the otherwise unoccupied parlor of the Neptune on the Quay-side Limerick, with a glass or two of whiskey stowed away, and another on the table by his side, Mike Finnigan stood before him, with his face and hands washed, and his shock of red hair cut short and reduced to some small degree of subordination.

Frankly and simply, "Onlucky Mike" told his artless tale, and begged the captain to take him over the "big salt say" with him, declaring that he could "work like a nigger," could "live on a herrin' a week an' a couple o' praties a day," and using sundry other arguments to gain his ends.

Whether the captain was influenced by the spirit of the usquebaugh he was imbibing; or by the heart of love and loyalty that throbbed through Mike's every word, or by the fun of a secret conspiracy in which Barbara Heck was unwittingly concerned; or, which is likely enough, by the great difficulty of obtaining hands enough to man the Colleen Bawn—probably a little of all, the bold request of "Onlucky Mike" was granted, and "Michael Finnigan, ship's-'prentice and cabin-boy was rated in the crew of the adventurous little schooner that bore Barbara Heck and her companions across the Western seas.

Mike's presence on board the Colleen Bawn was carefully hidden, by Captain O'Connor's connivance, from the party of emigrants aboard, until it was impossible for them to protest, or at any rate to put the lad ashore again. Barbara was seated on a pile of cordage as the little vessel slowly rode before the breeze.

"Can I do the last thing in the world for yez, Misthress Barbara?" These were the words that broke in upon her thoughts. She looked up in amaze, for the voice was familiar.

"Why—why—its 'Onlucky Mike'!" she said, upraising a cry of astonishment. "It is, isn't it?" she said again, eyeing his sailor garb, his short cut hair, his face showing daring intimacy with soap and towel! She might well doubt her eyes!

"It were that same poor omadhaun, Misthress Barbara," he replied, and the well-known twang of his peculiar dialect sounded pleasant to her ears; "but the day that Cap'n O'Connor put me in a boat and guv me a corner in the Colleen Bawn—the hiv'ns be praised for it—I fell into the Shannon, an' the duckin' baptized me afresh. I left my old name in the river over anenst the 'Neptune,' an' I picked another wan that fits me like the wing 'av a burrd. 'Onlucky's' departed—rest his sowl, an' now that I've found your swate self agen, an' can't nohow be rid of, my name's 'Lucky Mike,' an' Misthress, dear," said he, "You'll let me sarve you; an' let me live with you; an' I'll take in the 'good tachin'' for me soul and niver wance forget!"

This earnest appeal was accompanied by looks of such persuasive eloquence that Barbara could not resist or even object. She felt that poor Mike had been put in trust, and she resolved as was her life-rule, to do the duty that lay next to her and leave the rest to God. And so it came to pass that Michael Finnigan became the attached servitor of the Heck family and especially of Barbara, to whom, as we shall see, he proved a loyal and right valiant henchman in many a season of peril and in a "dark and cloudy day."

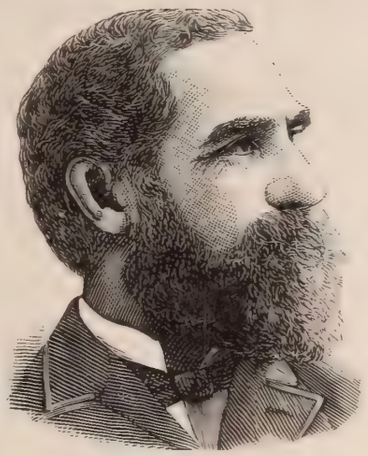
ON A "BLACK BELT" MISSION FARM.

The Philanthropic Experiment of the Industrial Missionary Association of Alabama, at Beloit — Plantation Life Described.

AMONG the problems that now confront Christian America, none is more pressing or more important than that which relates to the social and religious position of the negro. A most interesting experiment is now being conducted by the Industrial Missionary Association of Alabama, at the little settlement of Beloit, some distance from Selma, in Dallas County, of that State. The Association is an organized effort to reach in a systematic way the degraded masses of the plantation negroes. Nine-tenths of the whole colored population residing on these plantations are without the influence of the mission schools, intelligent churches, and free public schools of the cities and villages. In the "Black Belt" of Alabama, the richest cotton lands east of the Mississippi are found. They were bought up originally by the wealthy slave-owners, who imported vast numbers of colored people to work those rich plantations. Since slavery was abolished, the negroes have multiplied until they out-number the whites five to one. In some places they have churches, but they are intensely ignorant and immoral in their practice and teaching. It is impossible to reach them through the ordinary channels of Scriptural teaching.

The Industrial Missionary Association of Alabama has introduced its mission work by buying some of these plantations, dividing them up into small tracts, encouraging the colored people to buy them for their homes, and protecting the buyers as far as possible. While stimulating them to a better moral life, it is at the same time teaching them methods of agriculture and other home industries. This plan reaches their hearts, gains their sympathy and confidence, and prepares them for listening to the higher teachings of the schools and churches.



REV. C. B. CURTIS.
(General Manager of the I. M. A. A)

HOMES ON THE INDUSTRIAL MISSION FARM AT BELOIT, ALA.

The Industrial Missionary Association grew out of the peculiar conditions of industry, education and religion existing on the plantations of the "Black Belt." After many years of missionary experience and observation among the negroes, a number of sincere Christian Missionaries and business men, decided to undertake the experiment of systematic work in this neglected mission field. In October, 1888, they met in Selma and organized the Association, which was at once incorporated under the laws of Alabama. The plan adopted was that where ever a mission was to be planted the plantation should first be purchased and rented to the colored people, to be sold to them afterward as soon as possible; schools and churches were to be established and supported from the income of the plantation. Thus the work was to be made self-supporting. Shares of stock were issued, and each contributor to the enterprise received a certificate, entitling him to a voice in the management to the extent of his contribution. All the funds received were invested in productive lands, which, under judicious management have since become much more valuable. The income from the lands supports the schools and churches. The capital invested is thus kept at work for the Lord and his poor, preaching to them the Gospel. Rev. C. B. Curtis is General Manager of the Association, the other officers being Rev. S. Kingston of Selma, Vice-President, N. B. Richards of Beloit, Secretary, and M. V. Curtis also of Beloit, Treasurer, with a full Board of Directors. The Association started with four-hundred acres, which it has since increased to four thousand, the average cost being about nine dollars an acre. It erected buildings at Beloit, and now has seventy-five colored families, all living in their own homes, each house costing in the neighborhood of $100. The houses have each two apartments and to every householder is allotted twenty-five acres, at a rental of two dollars an acre.

"These people," he said, "have never been used to the life that is led in ordinary, civilized communities; they were born and raised in our section. We have three schools—one night and two days—and the pupils attend regularly. The principal is a white lady, Miss McLawry. Giving the negroes a chance to buy land and educating them at the same time, teaches them self-respect and independence, added to which we endeavor to bring them to lead a Christian life. Until now they have been so ignorant as to be easily cheated; indeed, they know nothing about accounts. They are rapidly learning, however. All live in the expectation of buying their own land outright, and some have already made payments on account. We give them ten years' leases, with contract to buy, and if they leave before their lease has expired, everything is repaid except the bare rental. All are anxious to become land-owners. The desire with them is the same as with the white man, the 'land hunger,' which is an assertion of the spirit of independent manhood.

"Our cotton crop—we raise seven hundred bales on the Mission—will this year average about one-third of a full crop. These people are, as a rule, very superstitious as well as ignorant. One man on the plantation pretended that he was a 'witch-doctor,' and the others declared that one of the women there, who had long been sick, was bewitched and even went so far as to point out a woman who they accused of bewitching her. We have occasionally cases of this kind to contend with, but on the whole we are making excellent spiritual progress."

The Alabama Missionary Plantation is the sole experiment of its kind thus far attempted. Universities, colleges, normal and common schools and similar institutions abound throughout the South for the black man, but no effort has been made to teach him the value of industry and self-reliance until now. When it is understood that the result of the experiment at Beloit is transforming a thriftless, lazy, superstitious and densely ignorant class into industrious workmen and intelligent Christians, its influence can be better appreciated. Nine-tenths of the blacks now employed on the plantations are as totally ignorant of modern methods of mechanics and other labor, as they are of the mysteries of the spelling-book. It is among this class that the missionary work is being carried on at Beloit, and the negroes on the Station are rapidly becoming a potent factor in the spread of civilized influences among the great negro population of the Black Belt.

All paid above this is applied toward the purchase of his plot. There are two chapels in the settlement. The Mission is divided into two sections, one having about 3,800 acres and the other 160.

The Rev. C. B. Curtis, while in New York lately gave some interesting details in connection with the progress of the Association.

The Association at the present time has over 1,000 acres of cotton maturing, 250 acres of corn, 600 acres of grass, 1,000 acres of pastures and 1,000 of fine timber which is fast being converted into lumber. It has also 3 schools and 3 regular Sabbath services, all being welll attended. Graded schools are shortly to be erected and a preparatory work will be undertaken with reference to college instruction. Meanwhile all the funds available are applied for immediate work in the industrial training department which includes every branch of mechanics. Carpenters, blacksmiths and wagon-makers are in special demand. Common farm-work, cotton growing and corn-raising are also subjects of practical instruction.

In the few years of the experiment it has been demonstrated that more substantial progress can be made in Christianizing and elevating the poor ignorant negroes of the South by combining industrial and religious training then by religious teaching alone. Contributions from many quarters have aided the Association in carrying out its work, but help is still needed till the time when the whole of the authorized capital of the Association is paid in, when it will have reached a self-supporting basis. Meanwhile all who have the temporal and spiritual welfare of the Southern negroes at heart will watch the industrial experiment with interest.

LIFE'S rough lines need the hewing
Of God who shapes all things.
The plan he is pursuing
Is the pattern which he brings.

'Tis true that beauty ever
Is God's most marked design;
He must our follies sever,
Straight to his plummet-line.

The chiseling Hand will bring
His wondrous work to light;
T'will lack no single thing

HONEST ADVICE
For an Honest Medicine

"Thinking my testimonial may be of help to some suffering as I have, I want to write what Hood's Sarsaparilla has done for me. A few years ago I was obliged to give up a good position on account of canker in my mouth, throat, and stomach, causing me such agony I could not eat, sleep, or talk in comfort. After over a year of such suffering with canker and of a scrofulous trouble, a friend urged me to take Hood's Sarsaparilla which he believed saved his life. I began to take the medicine; in three days I was very much better, and after taking two bottles was entirely cured of the canker and never was troubled again with it. I also improved very much in general health. Hood's Sarsaparilla gave me a good appetite, kept the bowels in good condition gave me good sleep at night. I can honestly recommend it as an honest medicine, and advise all to try it." ESTELLA S. STEWART, 118 Quincy Street, Springfield, Mass.

A FAMOUS FRENCH EVANGELIST.

How M. Saillens a Descendant of the Huguenots has Organized a Great Evangelistic Work in Southern France.

ONE of the best known of the noble band of workers whom Dr. McAll has gathered around him in his arduous labors in France is Pasteur Reuben Saillens, whose portrait appears on this page. During his tour in this country some ten years ago he won a host of friends here and was instrumental in organizing several auxiliary societies for the support of the McAll missions. M. Saillens is not now connected with the McAll work, as the church organized under his preaching in the Rue St. Denis, demands all his time and attention. Though Dr. McAll is doubtless sorry to lose his trusty lieutenant, he cannot but rejoice in the success which has involved the loss.

M. Saillens is descended from an ancient family of Huguenots and was born in the historic district of the Cevennes, in which the persecuted sect found a refuge during their time of trial. During his childhood his father removed to Marseilles, where he served as a colporteur. Subsequently a second move was made to Lyons, and there the boy was brought to Christ and was baptized in the Free Church by his father. He did some good work in that town in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association. One feature of it was the organization of a Sunday School for Roman Catholic children, which succeeded so well that six branches were established in other parts of the town. Six hundred children were gathered into these schools every Sunday and some of them who were converted there are now members of M. Saillens' church in Paris. It is a remarkable fact that he was only sixteen years old when he entered on this work twenty-one years ago.

The success attending the effort was accepted as an indication of his duty to consecrate his whole life to God, and he proposed to go to South Africa as a missionary under M. Casalis. Some difficulty, however, arose about this project, and M. Saillens went on with his Sunday School work and the various undertakings growing out of it. Dr. Grattan Guinness visiting Lyons in 1873, saw him so beneficently occupied, and urged him to devote a year to study and the development of his powers of teaching and preaching. The young man took the advice and went to the Institute managed by Dr. Guinness. After one year spent there he joined Dr. McAll, who had just commenced his Paris Mission, and was in urgent need of helpers. Scarcely had he commenced his work when one of those dispensations occurred which seem mysterious at the time, but which are understood afterward. M. Saillens was required as a French citizen to give a year to military service, and he was assigned to Marseilles. This took him away from his work in Paris, but it was the means of beginning the work in the South of France. He used a reading-room which had been opened there for the use of the soldiers and so great was the interest awakened, that when he returned to Paris at the end of his year of military service, matters were ripe for the organization of a permanent mission. He strongly urged Dr. McAll to undertake it, but the Paris missions were in urgent need of men and money, and it seemed unwise at that time to divert either to a new channel. M. Saillens, therefore, resumed his labors in Paris and for about a year preached twice a day in the Salle du Trocadero.

His longing, however, for work in the Southern cities did not abate, and eventually he returned to Marseilles and took up the work he had begun there. The French Y.M.C.A. and one or two wealthy friends helped him pay the expenses of opening a mission, which in a short time had three large halls in the city in constant occupation. M. Saillens gave five years of hard work to this mission, and at the end of that time had five stations in operation beside a school, in which he trained his converts to go into the country districts around the city to preach the Gospel.

The necessity of obtaining funds to continue [illegible] which was eminently successful. Returning to France in 1883 M. Saillens found the McAll Mission suffering from the loss of one of its most able and devoted workers—Rev. G. Theophilus Dodds. He at once threw himself into the vacancy and devoted himself to the districts of the Rue Royale and Boulevard Bonne Nouvelle. Here he continued to labor with marked success gathering in a large number of educated people of a higher class than those usually attending the McAll Missions in France. He became convinced that it would be a benefit to the converts if a permanent church organization were effected. During a visit about this time of Dr. A. J. Gordon of Boston and Dr. N. Murdoch to Paris, M. Saillens mentioned to them his wishes in this direction and consulted with them as to the best method to pursue. The two American ministers encouraged him to proceed and promised him their co-operation in the financial support of a church. He secured a building in the Rue St. Denis which had formerly served as a convent chapel and there with fourteen persons who made profession of their faith by baptism a church was formed.

Four years have passed since then and the church has grown rapidly. About three hundred persons crowd the little chapel and there is a church of baptized members numbering over two hundred. Beside the Sunday services M. Saillens opens the building at noon every day in the week for an hour's informal talk with workmen and others who come in their dinner hour. There is excellent music, as Madame Saillens has a beautiful voice with which she aids her husband in singing the Gospel. The church has several societies connected with it, including a Temperance society and is doing a very extensive work in and around Paris.

A SWEEPER'S CONVERSION.

REFERRING to a discussion among the missionaries in India as to the possibilities of success in working among the low class natives who are known as "sweepers," the Indian Witness gives the following illustration of the work: "One of the sweepers was converted in May last. Miss Rowe, the evangelist, heard him describe his conversion. He had not learned the usual forms of expression but told his story in his own way. 'I don't know,' said he, 'what happened to me; the earth went up and the heavens came down, and I was all upset, but since that night I gave no gali (bad language), my temper cooled down, and once when a lie suddenly came to my lips, I was wretched till Jesus forgave me.' This man's neighbors say of him that he is one of the most consistent Christians in the place.

"Now while it would mislead our readers to suggest that this is an ordinary type of sweeper-conversion, yet it is a sweeper conversion; a clear, satisfactory, undoubted conversion. It proves that these sweepers can and do experience spiritual regeneration. Lying and foul abuse are the habitual vices of this class and this man was so truly converted that he was saved from both. Were there but one such clear case in three hundred converts the work would be most hopeful. The testimony of that one man's life encourages workers to carry the Gospel message to this despised class. The poor sweepers of India have a sad story to tell of Brahminical injustice and oppression. If now the Son of God who is their Redeemer makes them before others the receipients of his salvation, it will help us answer the question, 'Why has God permitteded this particular class to be so ill-treated by their fellow men?'"

OUR HELPER.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

TOSSED about on life's rough sea,
Poor and helpless, lost are we;
Mocking sky and angry wave
Tell us there is none to save.

But there comes the Master's voice,
Saying, "Weary souls rejoice!
I can calm the wildest sea,
Safe are they that trust in me."

So we care not for the gale,
For our Helper cannot fail,—
Mocking sky and angry wave,—
Jesus Christ is here to save.

He'll not leave us to despair,
But will guard with tend'rest care,
Till, at last, the storms are o'er
And we reach the peaceful shore.

Hannibal, Mo. —MRS. E. HART.

A WAIF FROM THE SEA.

SOME people who are troubled by doubts as to their standing before God on account of the manner of their conversion may be encouraged by the following incident which was related in a Mission recently: A gentleman, who had been talking to some anxious people, rose when his turn came to speak and said: "Most of you know exactly where you were born and when you were born; but I happen to be rather disadvantageously placed in that respect, as I know neither the one nor the other. My parents perished in a shipwreck when I was little more than an infant, and I was saved, but nothing by which I could be identified ever came to hand, so it happens that I know neither the date nor the place of my birth, but one thing I do know: I was born, and I now possess a good strong body. Now there are people who spiritually are in much the same position as I am naturally. They cannot tell the day nor hour when they were born again, but, if they are conscious of the life of God within their souls, why should they worry? I know I am alive, and that is all that affects me. I know I must have been born sometime and you may have the same assurance. If you are alive in Christ you have been born again."

THE DEATH OF ROSE STANDISH.*

ALMOST before the Plymouth colony was formed, death, which invades alike palace and hovel, was among them cutting down the young and old. Consumption, scurvy, and sickness in almost every form seized them, and at times the able-bodied were scarcely enough to take care of the sick and bury the dead.

"I believe we will all die," declared Mrs. Brewster. "Then there will be no one left to bury the last one."

Mr. Brewster, who was sustained by an undying faith, answered: "Whatever God wills, I obey. If it be his holy wish that I should find my resting-place in this wilderness, I will not complain."

"But to die in the wilderness," sobbed Mrs. Brewster.

"It is God's wilderness," interrupted Mr. Brewster.

"So far from home and friends."

"God is with us. Jesus Christ is our friend."

"I cannot abide here. Let us return."

"O, my wife, your little faith shames me," replied the stern elder of the Plymouth church. "Do you doubt the goodness and mercy of God? Return? Whither should we return? To Leyden, and see future generations grow up weaned from the religion which we hold dearer than life, see them filled with the errors of sin, the loose morals, desecrating the Sabbath, engaging in immoral pleasures which destroy the soul? No, never! Better death in the wilderness. Should we go to England, would we be permitted to worship God according to the dictates of conscience? No; the true worship of the living God would be exchanged for empty mummery from the lips rather than the heart. Never that. Better death in the wilderness. God is here. God is everywhere. Though we are assailed with famine, sickness and death, we have the blessed privilege of worshiping God. As Moses led the children of Israel out of Egypt into the wilderness, so come we. They suffered from sickness and famine, so do we; yet God did sustain them, and will he not sustain us as well? Let us trust in God, and ever remember that though dark the night, the morn will come. Though bitter the bud, the flower will be sweet."

Mrs. Brewster, quite humiliated by the gentle chiding of her pious husband, buried her face in her hands and sobbed: "Forgive me, O, God, for I am weak! Give me strength according to my day and hour of trial!"

One of the first homes assailed by the grim monster, was the house of Miles Standish. The soldier's beautiful wife, Rose Standish, was the delicate flower which the blasts of New England winter were the first to nip. A cough seized on her lungs, and she soon succumbed to it.

The gallant captain who had never faltered in battle turned pale and trembled with anxiety as he saw his wife day by day grow weaker. At last she was unable to leave her coarse bed of skins and rushes. Tenderly the warrior cared for her, breathing words of hope; but she shook her head sadly, and, while the hectic flush illuminated her cheek, answered: "No, no, Miles; I can never get well. God has summoned me home. Be as loyal to him as you have been to me. I leave our child to you and you must be father and mother both to her." She ceased speaking, for she had grown very weak. It had been many years since the eyes of the soldier had been moist with grief; but now they grew dim, and the tears rolled down his cheeks. Mr. Brewster and his good wife came to the humble hut in which dwelt the captain and his dying wife. Famine and fever had wasted away her frame. Rose was but a shadow of her former self. She slept on the hard bed, the best her poor husband could afford. Mrs. Brewster carried something under her arm. She saw the dying wife and the weeping husband bending over her and then laid the bundle in his arms. It was a pillow.

The captain received the gift in silence, and gently raising his poor wife's head, placed the soft, downy pillow under it. What luxury! How sweet and soft compared with the hard, coarse bunting and bed of rushes to which she had been accustomed! This gentle action of love awoke her, and Rose, looking up in her husband's face, smiled. It was the smile of an angel.

"What have you done, dear husband? Such luxury as this is surely the gift of God To those who love Christ, death even in a wilderness has no terrors."

Again she fell asleep. The elder and his wife came and knelt by the rude bed with the husband. All silently prayed over the dying woman.

They watched her through the long night, as her fever rose and fell. Death's dread rattle was in her throat, and slowly her sweet young life ebbed away. All the night long the stern soldier, who had so often mocked death, was on his knees. All his hopes, his love and ambition were centred in the dying wife. Dark and gloomy was that night of death.

As day dawned, she opened wide her beautiful eyes, and, gazing on the face of her faithful husband, murmured: "I am still here. I thought I should be gone ere this." After another fitful, feverish sleep, she again opened her eyes and faintly murmured: "God bless you, faithful, loving husband; good-by." In a moment she was among the angels.

A NEW TRAMP MISSION.

A Tramp Mission has been established at Lowell, Mass. It originated in services held at the police stations where tramps were accommodated for the night. An earnest Christian man went around and read the Bible, sang and prayed with them. When the police forbade these visits in view of legal complications, the worker hired a store and opened a tramp mission trusting to the religious public to supply the necessary funds. It has been maintained to the present time. On an average about forty homeless wanderers have availed themselves of this refuge every night during the present winter. In addition to a bed they get a bowl of hot soup. For some of them, who are able and willing to work, situations have been obtained.

NELSON'S COURAGE.*

NELSON himself, just as he is about to step on shore, sword in hand (at Santa Cruz), is struck by a grape-shot in the right elbow, and falls bleeding into the boat. Nisbet, his step-son—surely it was Providence who sent him hither to-night—is by his side in a moment. His first thought is that Nelson is killed. The hero, however, gathers himself up, for he clutches his sword, with his left hand. That precious sword had been given him by Capt. Suckling, and he will not part with it while life doth last. Suddenly, high above the din of the contending foes, rises a wild shriek of dying agony from the crew of that very cutter, and before his eyes, by the fitful light of the blazing cannon. Nelson can perceive that she is struck, that she staggers, fills, and goes bodily down.

"Give way, my lads; now for the cutter," cries Nelson, the moment the shriek is heard. "Give way with a will!"

And on towards the drowning seamen rushes the boat. There is no thought of self with the hero at this moment. All his kindliness of heart, all his indomitable British courage, rise to the surface,—pain and danger are forgotten quite. Who is there in all the wide world, friend or foe, who cannot love and admire a man like this?

Of all the 180 men the cutter had been bearing toward the shore only 83 are saved, and many of these were hauled into Nelson's own boat. Some are even caught by Nelson's unwounded arm.

The Theseus is made at last. Nelson will not allow himself to be carried on board.

"I have still my left arm remaining," he exclaimed, "and my legs as well."

"And now," he cries, when he reaches the deck, "tell the surgeon to get his instruments out. I know I must lose my right arm, and the sooner it is off the better."

A piece of shot struck Nelson on the forehead at the fight in a Aboukir Bay, and the flap of skin and flesh hung over his one remaining eye, entirely blinding him. Nelson believed himself dying. But not even the darkness of what seemed approaching death could daunt the heart of the hero. The chief surgeon would have left his other patients unattended for a time to see to Nelson's wound, but he would not hear of it for a moment.

"No," he cried, "I will take my turn with my brave fellows."

And at last that turn came; and even the wounded and the dying raised a cheer when they heard the wound, despite the amount of blood lost, was only superficial

Nelson and Hardy on the battle-deck (at Trafalgar), in the very thick of the dreadful engagement. And, see, Nelson sinks rather than falls, and his faithful Hardy springs to his side. On that very spot his secretary, Scott, was killed some time before, and the blood, still fresh, stains our hero's clothes. I see him being borne tenderly below to the cockpit. I see him kindly hearted even in the hour of death place his handkerchief over his face that his brave fellows may not know it is he, their own loved admiral, who is being carried below. But overhead the battles rages on and on, and he can hear the wild "hurrahs!" of the men as ship after ship strikes her flag. Hardy comes at last and bends mournfully over him, utterly unable to suppress his emotion. But Hardy must tell him how the battle goes. Then this faithful officer, with a heart bursting with emotion, shakes hands, and rushes once again to his post on deck. But see, Hardy has returned; and Nelson can talk now only of the dear ones at home.

"God bless you, Hardy," he says feebly, and shortly after, "Thank God, I have done my duty!"

And these are the last words the Hero speaks. His breast heaves, there is one long-drawn, but half-stifled sigh, and Nelson is no more.

HUMBLE TRAVELLERS.

THERE sat in a railway carriage in Germany, a lady and gentleman, both well on in years. Their appearance and dress were somewhat quaint and old fashioned and they attracted the attention and the curiosity of a fellow-traveller. Entering into a conversation with them, he tried to find out who and what they were. Where were they going? To Stuttgart. Yes, so was he. Had they ever been there before? No. What hotel would they stay at? They replied that they were going to visit a friend. The gentleman asked no further questions, but his curiosity in this simple and rather countrified-looking pair was unabated. He supposed they might be on their way to visit some married son or daughter in the city who were probably working people. Arrived at Stuttgart all alighted, and he watched to see where they would go. To his utter amazement he saw them accosted by a servant in splendid livery, and handed into a grand ducal carriage which was waiting for them, and driven off to a palace. He learned afterward that they were Moravian missionaries had been laboring in Labrador and were esteemed for their work's sake by one who was good as well as great, and so it came that they were the guests of the grand Duchess of Wurtemburg. Many a man and woman in humble attire, who are much respected in the world, will, as the Apostle James tells us, be warmly welcomed on high when their work is done, by him whom they have served among men.

Question Answers

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Reader, McAfee, Ky. Does Dr. Talmage baptize by immersion? If so, why does he?

He makes it optional with the candidate. The denomination to which he belongs recognizes both modes—sprinkling and immersion. It insists on baptism, but not on the mode.

P. E. Genoway, Oran, Mo. 1. What and where is the Church of the Nativity? 2. Of what denomination is it? 3. When was it erected? 4. Do the words "wicked, ungodly and unrighteous" mean the same thing?

1. The Church of the Nativity is in Bethlehem, and, according to tradition, is located over the site of the manger-cradle of the Saviour. 2. It is common to all Christian denominations. The Greek and Latin Churches take charge of the services about equally. 3. It was built about A. D. 321 by Constantine. 4. They do, practically.

J. W. M. Bazine, Kan., writes:

Holman's Bible edition days of Melchizedek: "Some have thought that the bread and wine were sacrificial, and that he was a type of Christ. Others have strangely imagined that it was an appearance of Christ himself in the disguise of the priest. He really was both a king and a priest and so far typical of the spiritual king and priest of Jesus the Christ." Perhaps there is nothing "strange" in the belief that Christ was on earth before the Prophets, and may have appeared in the man, Melchizedek. To the writer, the prophets speak of a former Christ as well as of one to come. If the high and gifted Eunuch under queen Candace could not understand the prophets' writings, may not our wise ones be led into a wrong idea?

C. C. Jackson, Lookout Mountain, Tenn., writes:

A neighbor who moved near me from South Dakota over a year ago (that the Lookout Mountain climate might benefit his wife—a consumptive), bought at request of his wife for each of his five children, an Oxford Teacher's Bible, exactly like the one you gave my wife. He paid for his four Bibles—$1.50 each. Such a price would make your gift to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers $150.000. What other paper places before its readers the appearance and doings of so many great and noble Christian men and women. To behold in your paper such noble faces as Stephen Merritt, Phillips Brooks, Theodore F. Seward, A. B. Simpson, Tello J. D. Apery, Dr. Charles Cullis and George Muller, etc., is of heavenly value.

Jane M. Pettus, Rochester, N. Y. I see in the Mail Bag a notice about the premium Oxford Teachers' Bible, that is given to CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers. Does it mean that I am to send $1.50 for a year's subscription to the paper and $2 for the premium Bible besides—$3.50 in all?

No. $2 is the full amount needed to secure THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and an Oxford Teachers' Bible besides. The Bible premium is sent by express, charges prepaid, to every $2 subscriber to this journal.

Bayard C. Rogers, Martinsville, Ind. 1. What is the meaning of the "marks of the Lord Jesus," mentioned in Galatians 6: 17? 2. What is the meaning of the contraction "Gr." in the margin of the Bible and of "Ch?"

1. They have a reference to the practice of branding slaves with their owners' initials. A slave by showing the brand proved to whom his service was due and that no one else had a claim upon him. The marks of the Lord Jesus Paul bore were the scars received in his service—the marks of the rods with which he was beaten and the wounds he received in fighting with wild beasts. He showed them as evidence that he belonged to the Lord Jesus. 2. The letters "Gr." in the margin of the Bible stand for "Greek." The words that follow the letters are the exact equivalent of the original Greek which has been freely translated in the text. The letters "Ch." stand for chapter and give you a reference to another chapter of the same book. Thus in the passage you quote (Gal. 6: 17) there is the marginal reference, "Chapter 5: 11," that is Gal. 5: 11.

Mrs. E. W. Ellis, Ventura, Colo. 1. How many Christian martyrs have there been for the Protestant religion? 2. Is it true that there were nine million of martyrs during the first four centuries?

To both questions we would reply that the host of martyrs for the religion of Christ is an innumerable one. Of the sayings, sufferings and deaths of many of the early martyrs we have but little record left. There were ten great periods of persecution, viz: (1) Under Nero, A. D. 64, when Christians were slain in the arena by wild beasts, or burnt or tortured to death by hundreds of thousands; (2) under Domitian, who in one year is said to have caused the death of 40,000 Christians; (3) under Trajan; (4) under Antoninus; (5) under Severus; (6) under Maximinus; (7) under Decius, who in a brief reign exceeded all his predecessors in barbarity; (8) under Valerian; (9) under Aurelian and (10) under Diocletian, whose victims it is impossible to enumerate. The fire, rack, wild beasts, impalement and every imaginable form of torture were used by this fiendish ruler. 17,000 were killed in one month. In Egypt alone 144,000 Christians perished; 70,000 died in exile. The persecutions in later years, in Europe and elsewhere, though small by contrast, were still terrible in results. The Inquisition and Catholic persecutions in France, Holland, England, Ireland, Scotland and Spain increased the martyr roll by many hundreds of thousands.

Subscriber, Fulton, N. Y. Why is the word "seven" so much used in the Bible?

The frequent numbers used in the Scriptures are 3, 4, 7, 12 and 40, but 7 surpasses all the others in frequency and is regarded as the representative symbolic number of the Bible. It is especially regarded as the symbol of perfection. The Sabbath, being the seventh day, the perfect day, marking the perfected work of the Creator, the symbolic number was naturally adopted in the designation of sacred periods. Thus, the seventh month marked the Feast of Trumpets, the Feast of Tabernacles and the Atonement; seven weeks elapsed between the Passover and and Pentecost; the seventh year was the Sabbatical year; and so on. Various festivals, ordinances and rites of purification lasted seven days. The "perfect symbol" was carried out extensively in the arrangement of the Tabernacle. The early Christian Church, followed the same idea in the arrangement of its ordinances.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" AND THE VETERANS.

MR. J. W. DE WITT, a gentleman who has long been interested in the welfare of the men who fought the battles of the Union, writes us as follows: "Those who have had little knowledge of the frauds connected with the collecting and disbursing of our soldier's pensions, cannot realize the blessings of such a Cash-Checking Bureau as that established through the wisdom and generosity of the proprietors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I was engaged in Sunday School work at the time the first pension frauds were brought to light, and calling one day upon a lovely young Christian teacher, with whom I was associated, I was not a little surprised when, meeting me in her parlor, she threw her arms around my neck and laying her head upon my shoulder, sobbed convulsively. I drew her to a chair when the first passion of her grief was over, and asked as gently as I could what was the matter.

"'You've heard about my husband?' she said,—supposing his guilt widely known—'He is in prison.'

"There was another paroxysm of weeping, and then I learned that her husband was one of a number of pension agents who had been carrying on a system of plunder, and the facts then revealed determined me, from that day to do all in my power to aid widows and disabled veterans to secure and keep the money so generously and willingly given by the government to those who were brave and loyal in its hour of peril.

"If I had any doubt before engaging in this work, on the subject of human depravity, they were entirely laid aside after I had run the gauntlet of sharp practioners, who professed to guard the soldier's rights, and encountered the keen watchfulness and eager greed of those determined to appropriate a share of the money obtained. With this knowledge gained by experience, I write to congratulate your Bureau upon the work it has and is accomplishing, and to express the hope that similar Bureaus may be established in every city where Pension offices are located."

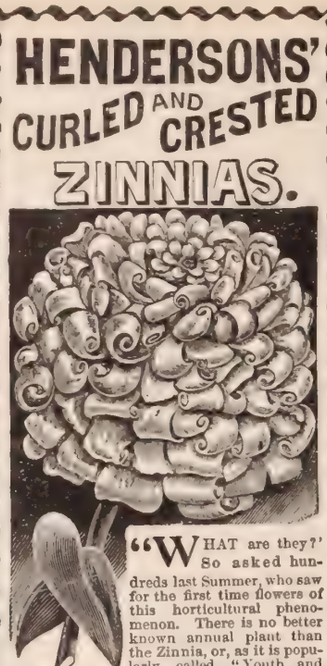
SUNDAY SCHOOLS AND THE WORLD'S FAIR

In 1892 the International Sunday School Executive Committee unanimouslyrecommended the erection of a Sunday School Building at the World's Fair, and contributions were solicited. Congress has decided that the Fair is to be closed on Sunday. $30,000 will be required to erect the building, which will be of wood, covered with staff, similar to the other buildings on the Exhibition grounds. An excellent site has been secured, 95 x 150 feet, at a rental of $5500 for one year. Plans will be ready early this month. It is intended to make the structure a model Sunday School building—an object lesson for all and it will be the religious headquarters for Sunday School and Christian workers generally during the Fair, besides being a centre of evangelistic activity on Sundays, under the auspices of Mr. Moody's Evangelization Society. Contributions of one dollar each are solicited by the Building Committee. The Treasurer is R. W. Hare, 200 Market Street, Chicago, Ill.

CONVERSION PROVED.

DESCRIBING the converts recently baptized at his station Kito-Chau, China, the Rev. J. Lutley relates the following incident, which, as he rightfully considered, furnished convincing proof that the man's conversion was genuine: "Koh had been an inquirer the shortest time of those received, but his experience was so exceptional that we could not entertain any doubt of his being real and true. Soon after he first believed he was much persecuted, and he also had much trial in his home. Only about two weeks ago, at the time of the drought, his villagers beat him very badly, because he would not pray to the idols, accusing him of being the cause of the drought. They first beat and kicked him, and then tied his hands together, and carried him to a village three li distant, where he became insensible, and they had to drench him with water to restore him; but it was not until evening that, bruised and stiff, they let him go free. They also made him pay a thousand dollars cash to give a feast to the men who had beaten and carried him. Yet he does not seem to bear them the least ill-will, and it was good to hear the poor fellow relating how, when they were carrying him, he remembered that Stephen while being stoned, prayed for his enemies; and he began to pray for his, asking the Lord to forgive them. We thought that a man who could do that while smarting with pain, must have the grace of God in his heart and we baptized him."

HENDERSONS' CURLED AND CRESTED ZINNIAS.



"WHAT are they?' So asked hundreds last Summer, who saw for the first time flowers of this horticultural phenomenon. There is no better known annual plant than the Zinnia, or, as it is popularly called, "Youth and Old Age." So if this new floral claimant is so distinct as to puzzle both professional an l amateur horticulturists, we can scarcely hope to present an engraving which will convey any adequato idea of its unique and wonderful beauty. Our Catalogue, mentioned below, contains a beautiful colored plate, on which is shown eight full-sized flowers of as many distinct types, but the seed offered will produce dozens of varieties, not only entirely different from the types portrayed in colors, but of equal, and, in many cases, of much greater beauty. At first glance the flowers suggest a

ROSETTE OF RIBBONS.

The flowers are large, full and double; the petals being twisted, curled and crested into the most fantastic forms, entirely free from the stiffness characteristic of all other varieties in this family of plants. A remarkable feature in this novelty is that it should present in so short a time such an overwhelming variety of colors, every possible shade and color found in Zinnias, and, in many classes, only attained after years of culture and hybridization, this new comer has reached at a single bound. It is less than four years ago that we detected, in a large bed of Zinnias at our Trial Grounds, a single plant, from which sprang this marvellous new race—marvellous not only in its distinctiveness, but in the myriad variety of colors with which it has already adorned our gardens. A full history of HENDERSON'S CURLED and CRESTED ZINNIAS will be found in our Catalogue offered below.

THE CHILDREN OF MEN.

WHAT shall we do with the children of men,
When they flatter and smile and deceive,
And break the best laws they have made us and then
Look on us in scorn if we grieve?
What shall we do when their faults we have scanned,
And their failings are brought to the light,
When the great ship of hope we have recklessly manned
Goes down with the breakers at night?
And the crew that we loved! every man was a king,
Enthroned in the realm of the heart,
And the trial of each brought its own secret
And a callous succeeded the smart. [sting
What shall we do when we've learned that a
Often covers the surface of hate? [smile
While deep in the pool whose ripples beguile
Lies the malice discovered too late?
When the friends we have trusted and honored and loved
Grow suddenly haughty and cold;
And the tried ones whose honor we think we have proved
Are turned by the glitter of gold?
The cup of beneficence poured without stint
Is lost in ingratitude's tide,
While the gold of our hearts in love's sacred
Is but coined to be jostled aside. [mint,
What shall we do with the children of men?
Shall we leave them all out of our hearts?
Shall we grow bitter and frigid and then—
Crush every fond hope as it starts?
Shall we shut ourselves in from the world and its wiles,
That we never again be deceived?
Shall we turn with distrust from the tears and the smiles,
And be dumb when our spirits are grieved?
What then? We shall starve for the sweets we have spurned,
Lest a bitter perchance might be found;
We shall put out the light that in darkness has burned
Because sometimes it failed to abound.
Who can measure the truth or the love of the hearts
That around us are throbbing with life?
Who knows with what pain they are playing their parts,
Or how soon they may faint in the strife?
Suppose that sometimes they are haughty and cold,
And sometimes they wrong us we know;
Because there is dross shall we say there's no gold?
That no streams save bitter ones flow?
Because many are false shall we say truth has flown?
And we'll trust not and love not again?
God help us! we're weak, we have faults of our own,
For we, too, are the children of men.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

÷ MODENE ÷

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth and the hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. WOMAN'S BATTALION OF SERVICE.

 The Splendid Christian Work of the Baptist Training School in Chicago—An Army of Consecrated Young Workers, Ardent and Efficient in the Gospel Field. ***

GOD is working wondrously through the noble, consecrated women of America. In no field have they displayed more devotion or achieved greater success than as bearers of the message of a living Saviour to the poor and lowly. The first school established in this country, devoted to the training of women for missionary work, is located in Chicago and carried on under the auspices of the Women's Baptist Home Mission Society. This Society itself is exceptional, being the first organization of the kind composed wholly of women and conducting its work independently of any other organization. Its existence is the result of a pressing demand from all parts of the country for a specific line of missionary work among women and children, which can be done only by women. Its first missionaries were sent to the negroes and Indians, but its fields have been gradually multiplied, until it numbers its missionaries not only among Indians and negroes, but immigrants from Asia and Europe, notably Chinese, Germans, Danes, Swedes, Norwegians and Bohemians, also among Mormons, Mexicans and Jews and among non-Christian Americans, especially in the new West.

MISS MARY G. BURDETTE.—Corresponding Secretary.

The most stubborn difficulty which confronted the Society was the securing of competent workers. It soon became evident that the work was too difficult and momentous to be entrusted to any but those who proved their fitness. The idea of instituting a school where women could be trained for and tested in missionary work was suggested to the Executive Board by Mrs. J. M. Crouse, the President of the Women's Baptist Home Mission Society, in April, 1881, and a committee was appointed to prepare a plan. This plan was submitted to and endorsed by the Society at its annual meeting held in Indianapolis, Ind., in May, 1881, and $1,000 was pledged to inaugurate the enterprise. The school was formally opened September 5th, 1881. Besides familiarity with the Bible, and skill in applying its truths to the various circumstances of all classes of people missionaries need some knowledge of the structure of the body, the laws of health, the prevention of disease, the care of the sick, the preparation of wholesome food and of healthful clothing, in short, of everything that enters into the question of intelligent Christian home-making, developing in the women a sense of the obligations resting upon them as wives and mothers, teaching them how to discharge these duties, and training the children to habits of cleanliness truthfulness, honesty, industry, politeness and purity as the outgrowth of true religion. To this end the Bible is the source of wisdom, the hand-book of instruction, the "law and the testimony." The students in the Baptist Missionary Training School are instructed in the principles of frugal living, including the selection and preparation of wholesome food, and in physical and vocal culture, that they may make the best possible use of their bodies, and convey instruction in the most effective manner. Scripture doctrines and methods of exposition and application are taught by eminent ministers and well qualified Christian workers, while the recognition and treatment of disease, conduct in emergencies and care of the sick are taught by skilful physicians and nurses. Kindergarten principles and methods receive careful attention; as also practice in the cutting of garments and the preparation of other work for use in the Industrial Schools. Rules of order and much that may be called miscellaneous add to the comprehensiveness of the curriculum. The students are thoroughly tested in personal work in the house, in the class-rooms and in their respective fields, as well as in recitations and lectures. They are also trained to have a time and place for every duty, and to keep everything in its place. The field work of the students is prosecuted in three mission districts in the city of Chicago, and is under the immediate direction of the Preceptress, Mrs. C. D. Morris, as is also the supervision of the students in the class-room, while the domestic department is directed by the matron, Mrs. M. M. Whaley.

The school, as a whole, is conducted under the direction of the Executive Board of the Women's Baptist Home Mission Society. This body lays out the curriculum, appoints the Preceptress and Matron, engages lecturers and teachers, and solicits funds for the support of the Institution. Students taking the course in the school are not thereby bound to enter the service of the Women's Baptist Home Mission Society, but are at liberty to enter any avenue of Christian work open to them, and for which they are best fitted. The total enrolment of students from Sept. 5, 1881, to Dec. 1, 1892 was 270, and the present membership is 54, as many as can be accommodated in the building. More room is needed and must be provided in the not distant future.

THE BAPTIST MISSIONARY TRAINING SCHOOL, CHICAGO.

Graduates from this school may be found actively engaged in every line of Christian work and in nearly all parts of the world. Among them are Sunday School, Church and City missionaries, missionaries among all classes of people in our own land in China, Japan, Burmah and India. A number have married ministers who testify to their efficiency as helpmeets. Wherever they go, and whatever they do, they bear frequent and hearty testimony to the value of the drill at the Training School. The property on Indiana Avenue, occupied as the headquarters of the Society and the home of the school, is valued at about $60,000 and is practically free from debt. Mrs. J. N. Crouse is President, Miss Mary G. Burdette, Corresponding Secretary, and Mrs. A. H. Barber, Treasurer of the Women's Baptist Home Mission Society; Mrs. C. D. Morris, is Preceptress, and Mrs. M. M. Whaley, Matron of the Baptist Missionary Training School, carried on under its auspices. In 1881, it was decided to open a school for Christian women where they could be trained for efficient missionary service. The first class

AT THE CROSSING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday in the Fort Street Presbyterian Church, Detroit. Text: Joshua 3: 17, "And the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan, and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan."

WASHINGTON crossed the Delaware when crossing was pronounced impossible, but he did it by boat. Xerxes crossed the Hellespont with two millions of men, but he did it by bridge. The Israelites crossed the Red Sea; but the same orchestra that celebrated the deliverance of the one army, sounded the strangulation of the other. This Jordanic passage differs from all. There was no sacrifice of human life—not so much as the loss of a linchpin. The vanguard of the host, made up of priests, advanced until they put their foot at the brim of the river, when immediately the streets of Jerusalem were no more dry than the bed of that river. It was as if all the water had been drawn off, and then the dampness had been soaked up with a sponge, and then by a towel the road had been wiped dry.

Yonder goes a great army of Israelites, the hosts in uniform; following them the wives, the children, the flocks, the herds. The people look up at the crystalline wall of the Jordan as they pass, and think what an awful disaster would come to them if, before they got to the opposite bank of that Ajalon wall, that wall should fall on them; and the thought makes the mothers hug their children close to their hearts as they swiften their pace. Quick, now; get them all up on the banks, the armed warriors, the wives and children, flocks and herds, and let this wonderful Jordanic passage be completed forever.

Sitting on the shelved limestone, I look off upon that Jordan where Joshua crossed under the triumphal arch of the rainbow woven out of the spray; the river which afterward became the baptistry where Christ was sprinkled or plunged; the river where the axe—the borrowed axe—miraculously swam at the prophet's order; the river illustrious in the history of the world for heroic faith and omnipotent deliverance, and typical of scenes yet to transpire in your life and mine—scenes enough to make us, from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head, tingle with infinite gladness.

Standing on the scene of that affrighted, fugitive river Jordan, I learn for myself and for you, first, that obstacles, when they are touched, vanish. The text says that when these priests came down and touched the water—the edge of the water with their feet—the water parted. They did not wade in chin deep, or waist deep, or knee deep, or ankle deep, but as soon as their feet touched the water it vanished. And it makes me think that almost all the obstacles of life need only be approached in order to be conquered. Difficulties but touched vanish. It is the trouble, the difficulty, the obstacle far in the distance that seems so huge and tremendous.

The apostles Paul and John seemed to dislike cross dogs; for the apostle Paul tells us in Philippians, "Beware of dogs;" and John seems to shut the gate of heaven against all the canine species when he says, "Without are dogs." But I have been told that when those animals are furious if they come at you, if you will keep your eye on them and advance upon them, they will retreat. Whether that be so or not, I cannot tell; but I do know that the vast majority of the misfortunes and trials and disasters of your life that hound your steps, if you can only get your eye on them, and keep your eye on them, and advance upon them, and cry, "Begone," they will slink and cower.

There is a beautiful tradition among the American Indians that Manitou was traveling in the invisible world, and one day he came to a barrier of brambles and sharp thorns, which forbade his going on, and there was a wild beast glaring at him from the thicket; but, as he determined to go on his way, he did pursue it, and those brambles were found to be only phantoms, and that beast was found to be a powerless ghost, and the impassable river that forbade him rushing to embrace the Yaratilda proved to be only a phantom river. Well, my friends, the fact is there are a great many things that look terrible across our pathway, which, when we advance upon them, are only the phantoms, only the apparitions, only the delusions of life. Difficulties touched are conquered. Put your feet into the brim of the water, and Jordan retreats. You sometimes see a great duty to perform. It is a very disagreeable duty: you say, "I can't go through it; I haven't the courage, I haven't the intelligence, to go through it." Advance upon it, Jordan will vanish.

I always sigh before I begin to preach, at the greatness of the undertaking, but as soon as I start it becomes to me an exhilaration. And any duty undertaken with a confident spirit becomes a pleasure, and the higher the duty the higher the pleasure. Difficulties touched are conquered. There are a great many people who are afraid of death in the future. Good John Livingston once, on a sloop coming from Elizabethport to New York, was dreadfully frightened, because he thought he was going to be drowned as a sudden gust came up. People were surprised at him. If any man in all the world was ready to die, it was good John Livingston. So there are now a great many good people who shudder in passing a graveyard, and they hardly dare think of Canaan because of the Jordan that intervenes; but once they are down on a sick-bed, then all their fears are gone; the waters of death dashing on the beach are like the mellow voice of ocean shells—they smell of the blossoms of the tree of life; the music of the heavenly choirs comes stealing over the waters, and to cross now is only a pleasant sail. How long the boat is coming! Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Christ the Priest advances ahead, and the dying Christian goes over dry-shod on coral beds, and flowers of heaven, and paths of pearl.

Oh, could we make our doubts remove—
Those gloomy doubts that rise,
And view the Canaan that we love
With unbeclouded eyes!
Could we but climb where Moses stood,
And view the landscape o'er,
Not Jordan's stream, nor death's cold flood,
Could fright us from the shore.

Again, this Jordanic passage teaches me the completeness of everything that God does. When God put an invisible dam across Jordan, and it was halted, it would have been natural, you would have supposed, for the water to have overflowed the region all around about, and that great devastation would have taken place. But when God put the dam in front of the river, he put a dam on the other side of the river, so that, according to the text, the water halted and reared and stood there, and not overflowing the surrounding country. Oh, the completeness of everything that God does!

One would have thought that, if the waters of Jordan had dropped until they were only two or three feet deep, the Israelites might have marched through it, and have come up on the other bank with their clothes saturated and their garments like those of men coming ashore from shipwreck, and that would have been as wonderful a deliverance; but God does something better than that. When the priests' feet touched the waters of Jordan and they were drawn off, they might have thought there would have been a bed of mud and slime through which the army should pass. Draw off the water of the Hudson or the Ohio, and there would be a good many days, and perhaps many weeks, before the sediment would dry up; and yet here, in an instant, immediately, God provides a path through the depths of Jordan; it is so dry, the passengers do not even get their feet damp. Oh, the completeness of everything that God does! Does he make a universe?—it is a perfect clock, running ever since it was wound up, the fixed stars the pivots, the constellations, the intermoving wheels, and ponderous laws the weights and mighty swinging pendulum: the stars in the great dome of night, striking the midnight, and the sun with brazen tongue, tolling the hour of noon. The wildest comet has a chain of law that it cannot break. The thistledown flying before the school-boy's breath, is controlled by the same law that controls the sun and the planets. The rose-bush in your window is governed by the same principle that governs the tree of the universe on which the stars are ripening fruits, and on which God will one day put his hand and shake down the fruit—a perfect universe. No astronomy has ever proposed an amendment.

If God makes a Bible, it is a complete Bible. Standing amid the dreadful and delightful truths, you seem to be in the midst of an orchestra where the wailings over sins, and the rejoicings over pardon, and the martial strains of victory make the chorus like an anthem of eternity. This Book seems to you the ocean of truth, on every wave of which Christ walks—sometimes in the darkness of prophecy, again in the splendors with which he walks on Galilee. In this Book, apostle answers to prophet, Paul to Isaiah, Revelation to Genesis — glorious light, turning midnight sorrow into the midnoon joy, dispersing every fog, hushing every tempest. Take this Book: it is the kiss of God on the soul of lost man. Perfect Bible, complete Bible! No man has ever proposed any improvement.

God provided a Saviour: he is a complete Saviour— God-man— Divinity and humanity united in the same person. He set up the starry pillars of the universe and the towers of light. He planted the cedars and the heavenly Lebanon. He struck out of the rock the rivers of life, singing under the trees, singing under the thrones. He quarried the sardonyx and crystal, and the topaz of the heavenly wall. He put down the jasper for the foundation, and heaped up the amethyst for the capital, and swung the twelve gates which are twelve pearls. In one instant he thought out a universe; and yet he became a child, crying for his mother, feeling along the sides of the manger, learning to walk. Omnipotence sheathed in the muscle and flesh of a child's arm; Omniscience strung in the optic nerve of a child's eye; Infinite love beating in a child's heart; a great God appearing in the form of a child one year old, five years old, fifteen years old. While all the heavens were ascribing to him glory and honor and power on earth, men said, "Who is this fellow?" While all the heavenly hosts, with folded wing about their faces, bowed down before him, crying "Holy, holy!" on earth they denounced him as a blasphemer and a sot. Rocked in a boat on Gennesaret, and yet he it is that undirked the lightning from the storm-cloud, and dismasted Lebanon of its forests, and holds the five oceans on the tip of his finger, as a leaf holds the raindrop. Oh, the complete Saviour, rubbing his hand over the place where we have the pain, yet the stars of heaven the adorning gems of his right hand. Holding us in his arms when we take our last view of our dead. Sitting down with us on the tombstone, and while we plant roses there, he planting consolation in our heart, every chapter a stalk, every verse a stem, every word a rose. A complete Saviour, a complete Bible, a complete universe, a complete Jordanic passage. Everything that God does is complete.

Again, I learn from this Jordanic passage that between us and every Canaan of success and prosperity there is a river that must be passed. "Oh, how I would like some of those grapes on the other side!" said some of the Israelites to Joshua. "Well," says Joshua, "if you want the grapes, why don't you cross over and get them?" There is a river of difficulty between us and everything that is worth having: that which costs nothing is worth nothing. God didn't intend this world for an easy parlor, through which we are to be drawn in a rocking-chair, but we are to work our passage, climb masts, fight battles, scale mountains, and ford rivers. God makes everything valuable difficult to get at, for the same reason that he put the gold down in the mine, and the pearl clear down in the sea, to make us dig and dive for them. We acknowledge this principle in worldly things; oh, that we were only wise enough to acknowledge it in religious things!

You have scores of illustrations under your own observation where men have had the hardest lot, and been trodden under foot, and yet after a while had it easy. Now their homes blossom and bloom with pictures, and carpets that made foreign looms laugh now embrace their feet; the summer winds lift the tapestry about the window gorgeous enough for a Turkish sultan; impatient steeds paw and neigh at the door, their carriages moving through the sea of New York life a very wave of splendor. Who is it? Why, it is a boy that came to New York with a dollar in his pocket, and all his estate slung over his shoulder in a cotton handkerchief. All that silver on the dancing span is petrified sweat-drops; that beautiful dress is the faded calico over which God put his hand of perfection, turning it to Turkish satin or Italian silk; those diamonds are the tears which suffering froze as they fell. Oh, there is a river of difficulty between us and every earthly achievement. You know that. You admit that.

You know this is so with regard to the acquisition of knowledge. The ancients used to say that Vulcan struck Jupiter on the head, and the goddess of wisdom jumped out, illustrating the truth that wisdom comes by hard knocks. There was a river of difficulty between Shakespeare, the boy holding the horses at the door of the London theatre, and that Shakespeare, the great dramatist, winning the applause of all audiences by his tragedies. There was a river between Benjamin Franklin, with a loaf of bread under his arm, walking the streets of Philadelphia, and that same Benjamin Franklin the philosopher, just outside of Boston, flying a kite in the thunderstorm. An idler was cured of his bad habit by looking through his window, night after night, at a man who seemed sitting at his desk turning off one sheet of writing after another, until almost the dawn of the morning. The man sitting there writing until morning was industrious Walter Scott; the man who looked at him through the window was Lockhart, his illustrious biographer afterward. Lord Mansfield, pursued by the press and by the populace, because of a certain line of duty, went on to discharge the duty: and while the mob were around him demanding the taking of his life, he shook his fist in the face of the mob, and said, "Sirs, when one's last end comes, it cannot come too soon, if he falls in defence of law and the liberty of his country." And so there is, my friends, a tug, a tussle, a trial, a push, an anxiety, through which every man must go before he comes to worldly success and worldly achievement. You admit it. Now be wise enough to apply it in religion. Eminent Christian character is only gained by the Jordanic passage; no man just happened to get good.

Why does that man know so much about the Scriptures? He was studying the Bible while you were reading a novel. He was on fire with the sublimities of the Bible, while you were sound asleep. By tug, tussle, pushing and running in the Christian life that man got so strong for God; in a hundred Solferinos he learned how to fight; in a hundred shipwrecks he learned how to swim. Tears over sin, tears over Zion's desolation, tears over the impenitent, tears over the graves made, are the Jordan which that man had passed. Sorrow pales the cheek, and fades the eye, and wrinkles the brow, and withers the hands; there are mourning garments in the wardrobe, and all around are the relics of the dead.

The Christian has passed the Red Sea of trouble, and yet he thinks there is a Jordan of death between him and heaven. He comes down to that Jordan of death, and thinks how many have been lost there. When Molyneux was exploring the Jordan in Palestine, he had his boats all knocked to pieces in the rapids of that river. And there are a great many men who have gone down in the river of death; the Atlantic and Pacific have not swallowed so many. It is an awful thing to make shipwreck on the rock of ruin; masts falling, hurricanes flying, death coming, groanings in the water, moanings in the wind, thunder in the sky, while God with the finger of the lightning writes all over the sky, "I will tread them in my wrath, and I will trample them in my fury."

The Christian comes down to this raging torrent, and he knows he must pass out; and as he comes toward the time, his breath gets shorter; and his last breath leaves him as he steps into the stream, and no sooner does he touch the stream than it is parted, and he goes through dryshod, while all the waters wave their plumes, crying, "O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory?" God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more weeping, and there shall be no more death.

Some of your children have already gone up the other bank. You let them down on this side of the bank; they will be on the other bank to help you up with supernatural strength. The other morning at my table, all my family present, I thought to myself how pleasant it would be if I could put all into a boat, and then go in with them, and we could pull across the river to the next world, and be there all together. No family parting, no gloomy obsequies; it wouldn't take five minutes to go from bank to bank, and then in that better world to be together forever. Wouldn't it be pleasant for you to take all your family into that blessed country, if you could all go together? I remember my mother, in her dying hour, said to my father, "Father, wouldn't it be pleasant, if we could all go together?" But we cannot all go together. We must go one by one, and we must be grateful if we get there at all. What a heaven it will be if we have all our families there, to look around and see all the children are present! You would rather have them all there, and you go with bare brow forever, than that one should be missing, to complete the garlands of heaven for your coronal. The Lord God of Joshua give them a safe Jordanic passage!

Even children will go through dryshod. Those of us who were brought up in the country remember, when the summer was coming on in our boyhood days, we always longed for the day when we were to go barefooted, and, after teasing our mothers in regard to it for a good while and they consented, we remember the delicious sensation of the cool grass when we put our uncovered foot on it. And the time will come when these shoes we wear now, lest we be cut of the sharp places of this world, shall be taken off, and with unsandalled foot we will step into the bed of the river, with feet untrammelled, free from pain and fatigue, we will gain that last journey; when, with one foot in the bed of the river and the other foot on the other bank, we struggle upward. That will be heaven. Oh, I pray for all my dear people a safe Jordanic passage. That is what the dying Christian husband felt when he said, "How the candle flickers, Nellie! Put it out; I shall sleep well to-night, and wake in the morning."

One word of comfort on this subject for all the bereaved. You see, our departed friends have not been submerged—have not been swamped in the waters; they have only crossed over. These Israelites we just as thoroughly alive on the western banks of the Jordan, as they had been on the eastern banks of the Jordan; and our departed Christian friends have only crossed over—not sick, not dead, not exhausted, not extinguished, not blotted out, but with healthier respiration, and stouter pulses and keener eyesight, and better prospects: crossed over! Their sins, their physical and mental disquiet, all left clear this side, an eternally-flowing, impassable obstacle between them and all human and Satanic pursuit. Crossed over! Oh, I shake hands of congratulation with all the bereaved in the consideration that our departed Christian friends are safe.

Why was there so much joy in certain circles in New York when people heard from the friends who were on board that belated steamer. It was feared that vessel had gone to the bottom of the sea; and when the friends on this side heard that the steamer had arrived safely in Liverpool, had we not a right to congratulate the people in New York that their friends had got safely across? And is it not right this morning that I congratulate you that your departed friends are safe on the shore of heaven? Would you have them back again? Would you have those old parents back again? You know how hard it was sometimes for them to get their breath in the stifled atmosphere of the summer; would you have them back in this weather? Didn't they use their brain long enough? Would you have your children back again? Would you have them take the risks of temptation which throng every human pathway? Would you have them cross the Jordan three times? In addition to crossing it already, cross it again to greet you now, and then cross back afterward. For certainly you would not want to keep them forever out of heaven.

Pause and weep, not for the freed from pain,
But that the sigh of love would bring them back again.

I ask a question, and there seems to come back the answer in heavenly echo, "What! will you never be sick again?" "Never—sick—again." "What! will you never be tired again?" "Never—tired—again." "What! will you never weep again?" "Never—weep—again." "What! will you never die again?" "Never—die—again." Oh, ye army of departed kindred, we hail you from bank to bank. Wait for us when the Jordan of death shall part for us. Come down and meet us half-way between the willowed banks of earth and the palm groves of heaven. May our great High Priest go ahead of us, and with bruised feet touch the water, and then shall be fulfilled the words of my text, "All Israel went over on dry ground until all the people were gone clear through Jordan." If I ask you what shall be the glad hymn of this morning, I think there would be a thousand voices that would choose the same hymn—the hymn that illumines so many death-chambers—the hymn that has been the parting hymn in many an instance—the old hymn:

On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wistful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie.
Oh, the transporting, rapturous scene
That rises on my sight!
Sweet fields arrayed in living green,
And rivers of delight.

A CHINESE GAMBLER.

In a letter from Mr. Gracie, who is laboring in Honan, China, is the following incident of a gambler's conversion: "A middle-aged farmer, who was a professional gambler, and, as the Chinese put it, gambled 365 days in the year, is now clothed and in his right mind. After he believed he went home and destroyed the household gods, and while he was doing so his wife and family thought he had gone out of his mind, and tried to rescue the idols but happily they were too late. Of course, the family thought that calamities would soon befall them. However, seeing their father altogether changed, and that he had given up his gambling, they concluded there must be something good in the new doctrine; and so now they are all believers."

THE LORD'S COMING.

S. S. Lesson for March 26. Golden Text, Rev. 22: 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

THERE is no one subject which occupies so large a space in the New Testament and which is so universally dwelt upon by its writers, as the coming of our Lord: it occupies nearly one sixth of the whole Book. And yet perhaps there is no subject so studiously avoided by the majority of preachers, so caricatured and distorted by fanatics, therefore so much ignored by the orthodox. In that book of the New Testament which was given by the Father to the Son, "to shew unto his servants the things which must shortly come to pass, our Lord himself says: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand." (Rev. 1: 1-3.) Yet the greater part of the Christians we meet are deplorably ignorant of the book of Revelation, and of the Scriptures which relate to the coming of the Lord. If they do not join the scoffers who say: "Where is the promise of his coming? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (II. Pet. 3: 4), yet they "willingly are ignorant" both of the letter and the spirit of the book, to the reading of which the blessing of God is promised.

And yet, for those who follow on to know the Lord, everything

Culminates in His Coming.

If God has, by his wondrous grace, made himself known to us and we are converted, it is that we may be like the Thessalonians of old who turned to God from idols to serve the living and the true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven." (1. Thes. 1: 9-10.) A true conversion always leads to serving and waiting for the Lord, not too busy with service to wait for him, ready to leave all when he shall come, and do all in the present moment, as we would like to be found doing at his return: not too absorbed with waiting to rest upon our oars, in the fear that his coming might interfere with our plans of work. The true spirit of service has ever a view to his return: "Occupy till I come." (Luke 19: 13.) "Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for your Lord," equally ready to go on working in preparation for his coming, or to receive him when he comes.

If the grace of God teaches us to be practically holy, consistent in our relations to God and man, it is that "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ. (Tit. 2: 11-13.) The light of his coming brings the true balance into our lives as regards God, our fellow creatures, and ourselves.

Spiritual gifts are bestowed upon us in relation to the Lord's coming. Paul writes to the Corinthians: "I thank my God always on your behalf, that in everything ye are enriched by him in all utterance, and in all knowledge . . . so that ye come behind in no gift,

Waiting for the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless on the day of our Lord Jesus Christ." (1. Cor. 5-8.) Of what service is any gift except

The coming of the Lord is the one vanishing point toward which all the lines in our perspective should tend. It is the comfort for the mourner because when he comes, the dead in them in the clouds to meet the Lord

Comfort One Another

with these words." What comfort can equal the hope of seeing again our loved ones who are gone home, when the Lord shall bring them with him, and what end of our life here can be more unspeakably glorious then to be found ready "worthy to escape all those things which shall come to pass," in the time of the great tribulation, and "to stand before the Son of Man." To see in the future a meeting with the Lord in the air, and a transformation in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye when this corruptible body shall put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality, as Jesus once put on mortality—is not this glory? Pain, sickness, weakness, death, mourning, coffin, grave, corruption shall be left behind forever, with all possibility of sin, and we shall be like him for we shall see him as he is.

It is this redemption of our body from the curse which came through sin for which the whole creation is groaning and travailing in pain together. The creation waits for deliverance from the bondage of corruption until the Lord shall come and openly show his victory over death, by raising the dead, and taking away his own without dying. Then the power of bondage to corruption shall be broken throughout the creation, and the Lord of life shall reign.

It is only as looking for his coming that we can take our place as Citizens of Heaven.

"Our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ." It is this which keeps us from taking root down here. We can bear to look upon the deterioration of churches, the disappointments in Christian workers, the non success of a great deal of work, when we are enabled to understand how, out of the failure of the human and the earthly, he prepares for a better state of things. In the very fellowship of his own sufferings, his own humiliation, he prepares in secret throughout all the Christian dispensation a people "for his name," who learn, while here on earth, to see everything from a heavenly and divine point of view; who understand the transitory nature of all down here till he comes.

Such a people will learn the patience of Christ: "Judge nothing before the time until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall every man have praise of God." (1. Cor. 4: 5.) They who are looking for him can afford to wait until his coming that errors may be rectified; it is not to them a matter of consequence whether they have praise of man, they are "redeemed from among men." As citizens of heaven they no longer "mind earthly things," they are "redeemed from the earth," their eye reaches over its circumference to hail "the bright and morning Star," and the Daystar has arisen in their hearts; they are children of the dawning day; they know that the night is far spent and the day is at hand. "Therefore is no strain upon them in their daily life to lay down their lives, their own wills, all which is life to them, and live consistently with the holy remembrance of the broken body and the shed blood of the Lord Jesus, showing forth his death till he come." (1. Cor. 11: 26.)

The apostle Peter strongly felt what an impetus the Lord's coming is to the holiness of life, and says, "What manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God. . . Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless." And Paul was equally anxious for his converts when he wrote: "That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world holding forth the word of life, that I may rejoice in the day of Christ that I have not run in vain neither labored in vain." And again to the Thessaloof rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? The apostle sought for no credit on earth for his work among souls, he looked on to the coming of his Lord. The apostle James is one with Peter and Paul when he writes: "Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and the latter rain. Be ye also patient: stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh."

And O how much more is there about his coming! The crown of righteousness is to them that love his appearing; to them that look for him shall he appear the second time unto salvation. Are we not then verily guilty if we neglect that which the Scripture teems with? Shall we not bow in deep confession before our God and humble ourselves for our supine indifference, and with others of his children watch for the morning, and "not sleep as do others" lest when "one shall be taken and the other left" we should be found among those that are left behind, when those who are counted worthy to escape the tribulation shall meet him in the air. "Surely I come quickly, Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." (Rev. 22: 20.)

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE eleven lessons which are to be reviewed on March 26, cover a very important epoch of Jewish history. Teachers will do well to accept the suggestion of the International Committee and survey the events of that epoch, instead of taking some other subject. The children should be encouraged to make a systematic study of the Bible, that they may understand what the book really is and in what its usefulness to the people of our time really consists; and this can be done best by impressing upon them the lessons of particular epochs as they are unfolded in the sacred volume. It should be explained to them that the history of the Jews differs from the histories of other nations chiefly in the fact that the Jew saw God in the events about which he was writing. A secular historian describes the rise and fall of nations and of dynasties, and analyzes and explains the causes which brought about the one and the other. The Jewish historian looks deeper. The events which the secular historian regards as sufficiently accounting for the results he records, the Jew passes over as merely secondary, and he goes to the root of the matter, by saying that this or that king "did evil in the sight of the Lord;" that the Lord stirred up another king to come against a nation and overthrow it and when dire calamities fall upon the people, that they are punishments for their sins. It is important that this characteristic of the Bible be emphasized, because there is a growing tendency in our time to ignore God's government of the nations. It would be a most beneficial result for the United States if the children now in our schools grew up in the habit of believing that God governs the world still as he did in ancient times, and that if a nation gives itself to the services of other gods, and thinks more of wealth or pleasure, or vice, than it does of the Lord of Hosts, God will punish that nation as he punished the Jews when they went astray. If that truth is impressed upon them, the Bible will become, as the Golden Text has it, a light to their feet and a lamp to their path.

Ancient Hand-Lamp.

The text has another significance in relation to the epoch covered by the eleven lessons under review. The scholars, who have of late given closer study to the Bible than scholars of past generations, have come generally to the conclusion that it is to the period following the return from Babylon that we owe the existence of the Old Testament in its present form. They think, basing their opinion on certain words and phrases of Aramaic origin, that the ancient manuscripts of Moses, Joshua, Samuel and other inspired writers were collected by Ezra and Nehemiah and their colleagues, and were put in permanent shape and form. It is evident, too, that in this epoch, the last words of the Old Testament were written. It was the period of Zachariah and Malachi, and at that time it is probable that the book of Daniel, Esther and possibly other books first came to general knowledge. It covered about a century, and must have been a period of wonderful intellectual and spiritual activity. It gave to the world Socrates, Plato, Herodotus and Xenophon; and in Judea, Ezra, Nehemiah, Zechariah and Malachi spoke the final words, which closed the sacred volume before the silence fell which was not broken until the Voice crying in the wilderness announced the advent of the Incarnate Word.

The ancients had lamps of many shapes. They had stationary lamps, such as the golden candlestick, a picture of which appeared in a former number of this journal, which was used in the Temple. It was a cluster of cups containing oil, fed to them from a reservoir at the top. Similar lamps, less costly and less elaborate, stood in the rooms of their houses. Besides these, they had lamps for carrying about, such as that a picture of which is shown in the initial to this article. Many such lamps, of various shapes, have been found in the excavations in Assyria, Egypt and Palestine. A person going from room to room in a house might use such a lamp, lighting it at the stationary lamp and carrying it with them to prevent them falling over obstructions. It is this lamp that is referred to in the Golden Text as a lamp to the feet. The Bible is this kind of lamp, because the Christian must go out into the dark pathways of the world and needs light to keep him from falling into error and into sin.

"I never fully realized the meaning," says an evangelist, "of the passage comparing the Bible to a lamp to our feet and a light to our way, until one very dark night, when I had to cross a wild stretch of land where there were several abandoned coal mines. I had been across it in the daytime and had noticed with surprise that the old shafts were still uncovered and not fenced in. I remembered this fact when I was setting out that night, but thought I should be safe as the path was well beaten between the yawning holes. But I lost my way and then I was afraid to move. I threw myself on the ground, cold as it was, and resolved not to stir a step. By and bye—it seemed a long time—but was probably not more than half-an-hour, I saw a moving light in the distance. I shouted, and was glad to see the person who carried it was coming in my direction. Very soon the man with the lantern was by my side and then I rose and with its safe guidance I finished my journey. The lantern was not much of a light, we should despise it in these electric lighted cities, but I tell you, I was mighty glad of it that night among those horrible holes. And I have seen times of trial and perplexity in life when the Bible did me a similar and much greater service."

"A sluttish housemaid," says Spurgeon, "when scolded for the dirt she left in the rooms and their untidiness, exclaimed that they were clean and tidy enough when she set them in order in the early morning, but it was only when the sun was shining into them at noonday that they looked dirty and untidy, because the sun was always shining into the corners. It is so with the Bible. Some people are quite at ease and satisfied with themselves until the Bible shows them what sinners they are.

"An infidel was arguing with a peasant," says Caughey, "and succeeded in thoroughly bewildering and confusing the man who could not detect his sophistries. At last the peasant refused to have any more argument. The infidel concluded that he had convinced him and that he would give up his Bible, but the peasant said no, he meant to hold on to it. 'You see,' he said in explanation, 'I get two strings to my bow with the Bible. If it is not true, as you say, it is still a very good guide for this life, and living by its teachings I am a better and a happier man, and I shall be as well off as you at the end of my life, because there will be an end of me and I shall know nothing of my disappointment. But if, as I believe, the Bible is true, then at the end of this life I shall enter on a new life of eternal happiness. By living according to Bible teaching I lose nothing if it is false, and I gain a good deal if it is true. In spite of all you have said I will hold on to the Bible;' and he did."

"I do not see," said a man who was notoriously dishonest, "that the Bible is of much use in actual life, its teaching is so obscure." A man who heard him, replied. "The Bible is not obscure in questions of morals. What, for instance, can be clearer than 'Thou shalt not steal?'"

Although the Bible gives light to the path, the reader of it may, nevertheless, walk in darkness, if he reads it with no desire to turn it to practical account. "I have collated every word in the Hebrew Scriptures seventeen times," said a Socinian to Mr. Newton, "and if the doctrine of the Atonement is there it is very strange that I have not found it." Mr. Newton replied, "Not at all strange; I once attempted in momentary absence of mind to light my candle with the extinguisher on it and of course I failed. Your prejudices against the doctrine of Atonement may have operated as an extinguisher and prevented your getting the light."

numbered sixteen. From the date of its organization, Sept. 5th, 1881, to June 30th, 1872, when the school had been in existence eleven years, it enrolled 240 students, of whom 167 were white English-speaking students, 2 colored Americans, 24 Germans, 2 Swiss, 22 Swedes, 8 Danes, 5 Norwegians, 5 Mexicans, 2 Jews, 1 Hollander, and 2 Bohemians. A large proportion of the graduates have received appointments from the Woman's Baptist Home Mission Society. The Training School cordially welcomes to membership any woman who brings satisfactory references as to her Christian character. The School is supported partly by the students who wholly or in part meet their own expenses, and partly by volunteer contributions from Churches, Sunday Schools, Women's Societies, Mission Bands and individuals. Boarding expenses are $5 per week, but approved students can receive help to the extent of $100 a year, leaving $100 to be paid by each. It is the aim to make the school, as far as possible, self-supporting. One of the features of the Institution is "Training School Day," the last Tuesday of November in each year, when special meetings are held at which the interests of the Training School are considered and its finances strengthened. The facilities for instruction are abundantly equal to the demands made upon it. In the Theological and Bible Department the instructors are: Prof. E. B. Hulbert, D.D.; Rev. Geo. C. Lorimer, D.D.; Rev. P. S. Henson, D.D.; Rev. Wm. M. Lawrence, D.D.; Rev. C. Perren, Ph.D.; Rev. A. K. Parker, D.D.; Prof. Ira M. Price; Rev. O. P. Gifford; Rev. H. O. Rowlands; Rev. H. A. Delano; B. F. Jacobs; Miss E. Church, and Mary G. Burdette. In the Medical Department are: Daniel T. Nelson, M.D.; Henry P. Merriman, M.D.; Henry T. Byford, M.D.; Daniel R. Brower, M.D.; George W. Webster, M.D.; E. B. Weston, M.D.; Georgia Ruggles, M.D., and Chas. Beard, M.D. The vocal music is under the charge of Miss M. Aida Smith. Kindergarten Culture is conducted by Miss Elizabeth Harrison and Physical Culture by Mrs. Riley and Miss Blood.

At the Training School the routine is very far from being monotonous. Each day has its own special duties. Rising bell at 6:30 is followed by breakfast at 7:00. Then comes an interval of housework, followed by a prayer service from 7:30 to 8 A.M. Domestic occupations fill the time until 8:45 and from 9 A.M. until 10 is devoted to a lecture, the writing up of journals, or to study. From 10 to 11 comes physical culture or some other study, and the succeeding hour is given up to church services on Sunday and on week days to various studies. After dinner, a brief period of recreation or rest is followed by further studies. From 3 o'clock until 5 is devoted to preparing work for the Industrial Schools, to Missionary or Temperance meetings, Bible reading or exposition, or possibly music. After tea come evening meetings, and these are followed by an hour of quiet journal writing, meditation and devotion. All lights are out at ten o'clock.

Thursday afternoon is the most important of week-days, being occupied in house-to-house visiting, and calling upon the children of the Sunday and Industrial Schools. Each teacher looks after and visits her own class, many of whom may live along dark halls and foul-smelling stairways. In the course of this work appropriate Scriptures are read and prayer is offered wherever this can be done. Some of the experiences of the young missionaries in this work have been very touching. Their duties frequently take them among Catholics and among the most ignorant class of foreigners; but the rough hearts are unfailing captured by the kind attention these consecrated young women show to the children, and it is very seldom, indeed, that any obstacle is placed in the way of their teaching the little ones about Jesus and the life to come.

Children's Meetings are held Thursday afternoons, and this part of the work has been greatly blessed with many conversions. At one meeting, thirteen girls expressed a desire to be Christians, and a number of them gave evidence afterward of a change of heart. Through such little ones, the saving truths of the Gospel have been carried to many homes in the dingy alleys and noisome tenements, and they have been the means of bringing many fathers and mothers to Christ.

Success has attended the work of nearly all the graduates who have left the Training School for wider fields of labor. Churches and pastors have readily been found in different parts of the country, who wanted the services of these godly young women, and some are now engaged in Missouri, Wisconsin, New York, Idaho, Washington, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indian Territory and also in foreign lands. Testimony to the value of the Training School has been received from many points at home and abroad, declaring it to be one of the most efficient organizations on the continent, and a power for good through its missionaries, whether engaged in the home or foreign field. This is the outcome of the practical training it gives, and furnishes the best evidence that its graduates are fully equipped and competent spiritually, physically and intellectually, for the work before them. If Christian missions are to be prosecuted successfully, consecrated and trained teachers must be selected, and such knowledge imparted in the practical form taught at the Training School makes the duty of a missionary no longer an experiment, but systematic work for Christ.

THE BARON AND THE PHILOSOPHER.

A PHILOSOPHER'S tribute to a Christian is recorded in a recently published volume of biography. It was rendered by the great philosopher Fichte to Baron Von Kottwitz, who, during the distress prevalent in Germany at the beginning of this century, did a wide philanthropic work. After the war with Napoleon ended, the Baron devoted his time and all the income from his estate to the relief of the impoverished people, of whom there were many in and around Berlin. His own funds were not sufficient to supply all the help he wished to render, but he went on trusting in God for help. Fichte asked him about his work and the Baron told him that God sent him money in answer to prayer. "Nonsense," said Fichte, "prayer is for children not for men. A man wills, he does not pray." Kottwitz listened calmly to the scornful words. Then he said, "Ah, you are a philosopher and I am not; perhaps you can give me some of your wisdom. I will tell you how I am situated and you shall advise me. There are nearly six hundred destitute families whom the king has allowed me to shelter in the empty barracks. They must be fed to-morrow as usual, but I have no money available. What had I better do?" "I do not know," Fichte replied, "what do you think of doing?" Kottwitz answered, "If you cannot suggest anything better, I will pray to God and the money will be sent as it always has been hitherto." Fichte looked at the Baron in astonishment. "Do you mean," he asked, "that you have been feeding all these people with nothing more tangible to rely on than prayer?" "Yes," said the Baron, "that is all and I need nothing more reliable." "Then," said Fichte, "your faith is beyond my philosophy. It goes farther."

THE WEDDING FEAST.

Matt. 22: 1-10 Luke 14: 15-23.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

A CERTAIN king renowned and great,
A wedding for his son prepared;
The tables groaning 'neath their weight,
His royal bounty well declared;
The palace walls were all bedecked
With floral garlands rare, between
The hanging mirrors that reflect
On every side the gorgeous scene.

But even at the very best,
A marriage feast is incomplete,
Til every seat doth hold a guest;
And o'er the marble floor, the feet
Of blithesome youth do lightly bound.
Forthwith the king his servants bade
Carry the invitations round, [glad.
That friends might come, feast, and be

Yet, strange, to come they all refused;
Hearts filled with wantonness and pride,
The honor shamefully abused,
Of king and prince, and noble bride.
Then was the king exceeding wroth,
And mourned such base ingratitude:
"My favor they were never worth,
My palace they will not intrude."

Thus spake the king, and then sent out
The servants as he had before,
To call from regions round about,
The good and bad; yet room for more—
He bade them go and others find
In every by-way, hedge and lane,
The poor, the maimed, the halt and blind,
That cannot recompense again.

And thus the banquet hall was filled;
And well might mirth and music ring,
For heart of bride and bridegroom thrilled,
To hear them laud the gracious king.
Mark this, ye hardened and stiff-necked,
The Gospel-call you've turned aside;
Would ye be found 'mong God's elect,
Yield up your vain and boasting pride.
Make glad the Father and the Son,
By coming while 'tis called to-day,
For there are many lowly ones,
That hear the call and then obey.

Gilbert Academy and Agricultural College and its Educational and Missionary Work in the South—A Farmer Boy's Gift to the Colored Race and how it was Blessed.

AMONG the institutions that have proved of the highest service in the educational and missionary advancement of the colored race in America, Gilbert Academy and Agricultural College, in Louisiana, has been prominent for many years. Its founder, William L. Gilbert, was a native of Connecticut, where his father was a farmer, the son also following the same calling until reaching manhood. He afterwards established a great business as a clock manufacturer at Winsted and later at Astoria, and the products of his factories were known throughout the entire Union. In later life he became interested in banks and railroads. The farmer's boy who had himself received little education, but who had been a life-long Christian, resolved to do what lay in his power to give to others the valued opportunities he had missed and a large amount of his vast fortune was left at his death to the purposes of Christian philanthropy, the sum of $40,000 being devoted to the uplift of the colored race in the South. During his lifetime he had contributed $10,000 to the institution known as LaTeche Seminary Agricultural College in Louisiana and the additional gift, making a total of $50,000, afforded an ample endowment for an extended scheme of education on a broader basis. Gilbert Academy and Agricultural College was built in 1863, its originators being Gen. N. P. Banks, Gen. Thomas Conway, and Rev. Dr. Newman, with the co-operation of Gen. O. O. Howard. It was originally an orphan home, academy and manual labor school. The munificent endowment enabled it to include scientific, industrial and practical training. It has produced a multitude of capable school-teachers and a large number of self-supporting mechanics. Among the leading men whom it has educated and given to the country are: Hon. John F. Patty, Naval Officer of the United States, at the port of New Orleans; Hon. W. S. Posy, ex-legislator and ex-Justice, now agent of the Institution; Rev. Ernest Lyon, Pastor St. Mark's M. E. Church, West 48th Street, New York; Rev. J. J. B. Laban, Pastor Baptist Church, Baldwin, Louisiana, and Rev. Daniel W. Shaw, Pastor Mt. Zion Congregational Church, Cleveland, Ohio. Among its graduates are successful preachers, lawyers, physicians and merchants.

GILBERT ACADEMY AND AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

The College, which was named after Mr. Gilbert, its original benefactor (the town of Winsted in the Parish of St. Mary, La., being named after his birthplace in Connecticut), is essentially an unsectarian institution. It had a national origin and was chartered by the State for a general object, supported by the Freedmen's Aid Society, and the Board of Managers of the Freedmen's Aid Society are the Trustees. The Directors of Public Schools are Patrons. There is an Advisory Committee of leading men of the colored race in Lousiana. It is a branch of New Orleans University and its Academic department is preparatory to the department of Arts in the University. The Faculty consists of Rev. W. D. Godman, D.D., President; L. D. Gilbert, A.B., vice-President; Mrs. A. H. D. Godman, Emeritus Physiology; Mrs. H. A. E. Gilbert, B.S., Preceptress, and Instructors in Music, Drawing, and Mathematics. The school and practical training include Kindergarten, Carpentry, Printing, Bakery. The courses of study embrace a complete course of theology, a special Biblical course, advanced Biblical course, and an English Bible course. In the School of Agriculture, the students are under the instruction of a practical farmer and a skilled gardener. The female department includes classes in cooking, needlework, laundry, baking, etc. The buildings (some of them are shown in the illustration on this page), include the Industrial School, the "Centre" building (which has a chapel, recitation rooms, and library), Boarding Hall, and South Hall (both dormitories.) Tuition is free, the total cost to students being a nominal amount for board, one half of which is paid by labor rendered by the student.

HON. WM. L. GILBERT.

The moral and religious results of this philanthropic institution in the past in its influence on the colored race cannot be estimated. It has been commended by the most eminent leaders in the Baptist and Methodist denominations. Hundreds of its graduates are now leading active Christian lives, some consecrated to the work of the ministry, others as missionaries in home and foreign fields, and many eminent in the various professions. Gilbert College has made for itself a splendid record against the kingdom of darkness and for the kingdom of light. The time has arrived when its present facilities and resources are all too small for the work that hes before it, and extension has become a duty. The institution has the confidence of many distinguished churchmen (Bishop Mallalieu among the number), who have heartily and voluntarily endorsed its work, and commended it to the support of philanthropic Christian people everywhere. It is doing a grand and timely work as an educational and elevating influence among a much-neglected class in the South.

AN ILLEGAL GUILD

In a letter to the China Inland Mission from Chankia-keo in China, the Rev. J. J. Coulthard tells of the remarkable result of a prosecution in the discomfiture of a persecuting guild of workmen. He says: "One of the church members has been suffering persecution for about eighteen months. He is a fancy-box maker, and because he refused to belong to the trade guild, and contribute money to the temples, he has been continually annoyed and threatened. Last week the members of this guild brought an action against him, bribing the magistrate and his underlings, and our friend was beaten with fifty blows as well as imprisoned. We were sorely grieved, and I decided to petition the magistrate, asking him to reconsider his case. He saw his awkward position, and could not give us a favorable reply because he was in league with the prosecutors, so he referred the case to a neighboring magistrate, who, seeing the injustice of it, refused to take it up. We then appealed to a higher official, who made inquires into the guild, which was proved to be illegal, and is to be broken up. After this the accusers gladly came to an agreement to let our native brother alone in the future, not troubling him for subscriptions. What a change the Lord has made! Perhaps the trouble was of him, to settle once for all the question of idolatrous contributions. We praise him for it."

THE USE OF PICKLES.

THERE is a class of persons in the community whose usefulness we have just found out. We never realized until now what they were made for. They are struck through with acidity. Their disposition is celebrated for its crabbedness. You find them in every circle. They are especially known in churches as fault-finders. Their teeth are always on edge. They are critical of minister, eldership, and choir. Whatever is done, they act as though they could have done better. You sometimes feel like suggesting to them the propriety of going to some other church, or retiring into less conspicuous position. You look upon them as a nuisance and hindrance.

Stop! You are wrong. They have their practical uses. Church life, if happily conducted, is a banquet at which the sweet predominates. There is the sugar of helpful words, and the saccharine of genial association. The banquet is in danger of becoming flat and insipid. There ought to be at least one vinegar cruet in the castor. You need to give variety to the feast. You do not more need spices than pickles. Now you know the use to which some people can be put. Do not cast them out. Do not let them be the means of exasperation. Employ them at the church banquet. Tarts are good in their place. Brethren, pass around the pickles.

SUNLIT ANTICIPATIONS.

MUCH of the Christian work is done amid gloomy forebodings. Temperance men, overwhelmed with the statistics of drunkenness; advocates of political integrity, disheartened with the story of official corruption; ministers of the Gospel, stunned and crippled with the world's impenitency; Mohammedanism, with its host of three hundred and forty millions; Brahminism, with its army of one hundred and seventy-five millions; Buddhism, with its battalions of three hundred and forty millions, sometimes make the Christian man disposed to give up the contest. Indeed, throw out of the calculation the superhuman, and all reformatory, missionary, and ecclesiastical attempts would be a long continued absurdity. But the reserve corps has not yet come up. We are only planting the batteries. It is only five o'clock in the morning. Wait till the sun rises. Wait till God buckles on his sword. Wait till the white horses are harnessed to the King's chariot. Joshua's troops retreated just before they triumphantly took the city of Ai. Let the enemies of God beware when the army of Christ falls back. It is preparing for a universal rally.

Those who do not believe this had better quit Christian work, and go away. We have had enough of lugubrious Christians. They load once, shoot, fling away their rifle, and run. It is the cheerful worker who succeeds. If you have any doubt about the complete victory of our side, you are an infidel and a nuisance. Go away and hide yourself, you miserable skulker. But come on, all ye who believe in the utter rout of sin and the universal domination of Jesus. Not only bring along with you enough ammunition with which to fight, but enough trumpets and drums and rockets to celebrate the triumph. Hosannah to the Son of David, who is also the Son of God!

COLD EARS.

IT is cold, cold, fearfully cold. We see the people running along the street in seal-skin caps and big mittens. They come in blowing. They stand at the corners waiting for cabs or omnibuses: the thermometer about zero. They rub their stinging ears. They beat their arms around them. What do they do that for? To keep warm, they answer us sharply, as though we ought to know without asking. It is no spite that makes them seize the rim of their ears, and pull, and pinch, and shake them. But as the process went on, we thought to ourselves, that is what is the matter with a great many people. They suffer from cold ears. We have seen people in church, both summer and winter, the atmosphere at most genial heat, sitting with frosted ears, yet making no attempt to warm them. There are your critics, with astonishing cold ears. They listen. They measure your words with an iron rod. They weigh them in brazen balances. Words of invitation or entreaty may go forth from you red-hot, but by the time the ardent utterances reach them the warm message somehow gets cooled off. These critics sit in freezing imperturbability. Their tympanum is hung with icicles. They are congealing critics. They are dying of cold ears. What they want is friction.

Our plan is first of all to get them good and mad. We never can do anything with such people till with some vigorous exhortation we have pulled their ears. Somehow you must get the circulation started. Among the best saints in our Church are those whom we once made hopping mad by what we said about their worldliness, or greed, or stock-speculations, or theatre-going. We could do nothing with them till by some hair-cloth denunciation we have cured their cold ears. By some recent physiological explorations we found out that every man has six ears. On each side, the external ear, the middle ear, and the internal ear. That is the reason they get so awfully cold, there are so many of them exposed. Two ears are an embarrassment in such weather as that of to-day; but what to do with six is a still more absorbing question. Nature intended that we should have no excuse for dull hearing when she gave us six, the outer one defined by learned men to be a cartilaginous funnel, covered by the integument, serving to collect sonorous vibrations, and we suppose the others quite as tremendous. In every case school teachers and ministers must wake up these six ears appertaining to each individual, or fail. That was what made old Taylor, the schoolmaster of our boyhood days (perish his memory), pull our ears till he sometimes almost pulled them off. It was only a mean way of quoting a good precept. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." We would all be better off if we imitated yonder man at the street corner,—if, in church, and lecture-hall, and family, and everywhere, by healthful and vigorous friction, we tried to get rid of cold ears.

We noticed, however, that many of the people in the fiercest days of all the winter were more troubled with their hands than their ears, and they stood, some in one place and some in another, whacking their arms about their body till you could hear the thump a block off. Jack Frost had evidently attempted to shake hands with them, and, like some over-cordial people, gripped them too hard. There they stood pounding themselves,—first throwing their arm around one way, and then throwing their arm around the other way, until they seemed to be in quite a glow. Why did they not pound the brick wall, or the lamp-post, or some of the passers-by? Ah! they had found out that the best way to get themselves right was to smite themselves rather than somebody else. We all need some self-whipping. Much of the time we give for the chastisement of others we might better spend in chastisement of ourselves. When the Church is cold, instead of shaking others we had better do like the stage-driver, while waiting at the corner on a cold March morning, and begin to whack ourselves. The reason that the Pharisee did not get warm was because he chastised the Publican. The reason that the Publican did get warm was because he beat his own breast. We give our best oats of moral reflection to somebody else's horse, letting our own horse gnaw an empty manger. We pull away at the mote in our neighbor's eye while we have no anxiety about a beam in our own, large enough to keep a saw-mill busy for six weeks. At which cold-day considerations we drop our pen, wipe it carefully out, lay it upon a rack, and, taking our position mid-floor, begin to imitate the stage-driver; and having first rubbed our ears for a moment to get them in pleasant glow, we hurl our right hand across our chest in one way, and the left hand across the chest in the other way, with rapid and emphatic stroke, not only chastising our own shortcomings, but at the same time starting up lethargic circulation, and getting our hands warm, warmer, warmest.

FASHIONABLE LYING.

HOW much of society is insincere. You hardly know what to believe. They send their regards; you do not exactly know whether it is an expression of the heart, or an external civility. They ask you to come to their house; you hardly know whether they really want you to come. We are all accustomed to take a discount off what we hear.

"Not at home" very often means too lazy to dress. I read of a lady who said she had told her last fashionable lie. There was a knock at her door and she sent word down, "Not at home." That night her husband said to her: "Mrs So-and-so is dead," "Is it possible?" she said. "Yes, and she died in great anguish of mind; she wanted to see you so very much; she had something very important to disclose to you in her last hour, and she sent three times to-day, but found you absent every time.' Then this woman bethought herself that she had had a bargain with her neighbor that when the long-protracted sickness was about to come to an end, she would appear at her bedside and take the secret that was to be disclosed. And she had said she was "Not at home!"

Social life is struck through with insincerity. Some apologize for the fact that the furnace is out; they have not had any fire in it all winter. They apologize for the fare on their table; they never live any better. They decry their most luxuriant entertainment to win a shower of approval from you. They point at a picture on the wall as a work of one of the old masters. They say it is an heir-loom in the family. It hung on the wall of a castle. A duke gave it to their grandfather. People that will lie about nothing else will lie about a picture. On small income we want the world to believe we are affluent, and society to-day is struck through with cheat and counterfeit and sham.

YATMAN'S COLUMN

GOOD WOMEN.

ONE of the handsomest bits of Christian work I ever knew, was wrought by a Christian girl, who lived in Southern New Jersey. She was engaged to be married to a young man, a fine fellow, but not a Christian. She did not purpose to run any risk of an unequal yoke. She had more influence with him than all the preachers born; she fully determined her plan, and this was the result.

He usually called on Tuesday evenings; she could tell his foot-fall a block away. She asked the folks to leave them alone in the parlor for a little while, at the opening of his call—she, too, would open the door. By and by he came; she was a little nervous, but brave, having been much in prayer. They had their greetings; but, without waiting, she led him directly into the parlor, and, standing there, she looked him square in the face and said: "Look here, I've been thinking about this matter; I am a Christian and you are not; you and a man—a man—and not a Christian! You ought to be ashamed! I'll never marry a man who is not a Christian, but I am going to marry you. You must be a Christian! You must! Get down there; get right down there." She made him kneel in prayer, and before he scarce knew what was happening, she was pouring out her heart to God for his conversion.

It is no wonder to me, that on the next evening, in a very crowded revival service, he was the first one to rise for prayers, going to the inquiry room, where he found life and light in believing on Jesus, the Son of God. Now if you will come with me to that city, I will show you a home, where the husband accompanies his wife to church, not because she begs him, but because he loves the Tabernacle of the Most High; and I will show you a home, where two children are being brought up under the influence of a godly father, as well as a godly mother. How sadly different it might have been, had this girl waited as thousands of others have, to their sorrow.

I tell you, women, that no matter how it may be with you, with men, when they lose their respect, love is soon gone; and when there is no love between husband and wife, the case is sad. The question will naturally arise, what about the wife's duty to the Church? As my opinion—others may not agree with me—her first obligation is to husband and home. If I know anything about it, God created woman to be the helpmate of man; for it was not good for him, and never has been, to be alone. I have known women to go gadding off to church, when their place was manifestly somewhere else. I was holding meetings in a Western city, where the services convened three times a day; an early service at six, another in the afternoon, and another at night; they were all well attended, deep interest manifested, good results constantly coming forth. A lady approached me one day and said, "Mr. Yatman, I wish you would preach practical religion." I told her I thought that had been my plan. "No, no!" said she, "I mean practical, real practical religion." I saw something was on her mind—women usually have something there—and I asked her to "quote me a text."

"Well, it's not so much a text as a fact. You hold meetings three times a day."

"Yes," I answered.

"Just wait, Mr. Yatman; you hold meetings three times a day, and that is all right; but it isn't all right for everybody to go all the while. There is one woman, I know, whose husband is not a Christian, and never will be, if she keeps on as she is now doing. They have three children, and he is a hard-working man. What does he find? Why this: she goes off to meetings in the morning and leaves him home to get three children up, and dress them, and then get his own breakfast before he goes to work."

"There, there; that's enough," said I, "that's enough." And you may well believe that the next service had in it some hot truth on "practical religion," for the duty of that woman was home, and not at the meetings.

I hope my readers won't swing clear off and never go to religious services again; that would be sad; but let me repeat, that a wife should meet the obligations resting on her, and no service could be more sacred, than to fulfil these home duties.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE PROTESTING PRINCESS.

A FORMAL protest against the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands by the United States is made by the young lady whose portrait appears on this page, and who arrived in New York on March 1. She is the Princess Kaiaulani, heiress presumptive to the Hawaiian throne. Her mother was the Princess Likiliki, who was the sister of the ex-Queen and of the late King Kalakaua. Her mother is dead, but her father is living and is collector of customs in Hawaii. He is a Scotchman by birth and his name is Archibald S. Cleghorn. The Princess is nearly eighteen years old, and has been in England since she was eleven. Her full name is Victoria Kawekiu Kaiaulani Lunalilo Kalaninuiahilapalapa. She was completing her education in a seminary when the news arrived that Queen Liliuokalani had abdicated and that her ministers had petitioned for annexation to the United States. The Princess set out immediately for America, under the care of her guardian, Mr. Theodore H. Davies, who is an extensive planter in Hawaii and also holds the office of British Consul at Honolulu. She has issued an address to the American people in which she contends that her people do not desire annexation, which is wanted only by the white residents on the islands. She says that three of the commissioners, who have come to Washington to plead for it, are sons of missionaries, who preached the gospel in Hawaii and are now trying to undo the work of their fathers by robbing the people of their independence. She declares herself a Christian and does not believe that a Christian people will sanction the scheme to defraud her of the inheritance which is her birthright. Her claim will, doubtless, receive due consideration, but it is not a strong one. It is based solely on the fact that her uncle Kalakaua was elected to the throne nineteen years ago when the old royal family, the Kamehamehas, became extinct. Neither Kalakaua nor his sister Liliuokalani, who succeeded him, proved fit for the position and it may be that the Hawaiians really wish to dispense with royalty altogether. The decision should rest with them and if they declare for annexation the Princess ought to waive her claims. If she is a Christian, as she says, she must have learned that in sacrificing honors and dignities for the sake of the happiness and prosperity of the people, she will best follow the example of Christ, who "made himself of no reputation and took on him the form of a servant" that the world might be saved. (Phil. 2: 7.)

A Ghastly Bequest.

An old newspaper man who died in St. Louis, Mo., a few days ago left a will which by his orders was opened and read before his funeral. The reason for doing so was disclosed when the will was read. One of its clauses provided for an autopsy being made and directed that his heart should be removed and enclosed in a metal casket, which should be sent to his wife in Germany. It appears that when a young man in the German army he fell in love with a very beautiful lady and married her. Some time afterward circumstances occurred which necessitated his leaving the country. He came to America but was unable to induce his wife to accompany him. Years afterward, when he had settled in St. Louis and was doing well, he again urged her to come, but she refused. When the old man was near death, he had the will drawn, in which he said that his heart had been his wife's all through the years and, as it was still her's, he wished her to have it. His heart was sent to his wife as he directed, but she will probably place no more value on it than she did on the love of which it is the symbol. The man evidently placed his highest treasure in hands unworthy of it. He would not have died forlorn and desolate had he given it to him who said, "Son, give me thine heart." (Proverbs 23: 26.)

A Tree in His Throat.

A Philadelphia surgeon made a discovery recently which he believes has no precedent in medical experience. A lady brought her little boy to his office and asked him if he could get an orange seed out of the child's throat. The doctor found that the seed had lodged in the windpipe, but he was unable to get it up. He thought that it might come away naturally and as it caused no inconvenience, it might do no harm by remaining a day or two. Some time afterward, he was called in to see the child, whom he found to be in danger of suffocation. After consulting with another physician it was decided that only tracheotomy could save the child's life. An incision was made in the windpipe and the orange seed was found, imbedded in a mass of white pulp. It occupied a very dangerous position at the point where the windpipe joins the lung. When the seed was examined, it was found that the heat of the child's body had caused it to swell and burst at one end, and a sprout had grown from it which would soon have completely filled the windpipe. It was evidently a mistake to suppose that as the seed caused no pain it might do no harm in the windpipe. The doctor had forgotten that it might grow. A similar mistake is often made as to the dangerous traits in a child's character. A disposition to untruthfulness or profanity or other evils, if not eradicated in childhood, may grow until it stifles spiritual life in after years. (Proverbs 22: 6.)

The Treacherous Mirage.

The superintendent of a cattle ranch in New Mexico describes in a San Francisco journal the dangers of the mirage which is frequently seen on the plains near the Mexican Border. He says that the air is so thin and pure that the mirage is extremely vivid and only those persons who know by actual experience that what they see does not and cannot exist on the plains, can believe that the spectacle is an optical illusion. He states that quite recently a man who set out from Juarez, Mexico, to go to Los Palomas, in New Mexico, nearly lost his life through this delusion. He was driving a wagon loaded with merchandise and had reached a point below Deming, when he saw a short distance off on his right, a beautiful lake shaded by trees. Both he and his team were very thirsty, so he turned out of his course to get water. After travelling several miles the lake seemed as far off as at first. But it was there, clear and distinct before him. Never thinking of the mirage, he continued in the direction of the lake and fancied he could feel on his face the fresh breeze from the water. As the distance did not appear to diminish, the idea that it was the mirage, of which he had heard, but had never seen, dawned on him and he turned back to the road. But night fell before he reached it and he lost his way. In the morning he could not recognize any indication of his proper course and all his efforts to find the road were unavailing. He knew, however, that his only hope of safety was to persevere and eventually, after a delay of four days, he succeeded in reaching his destination. Many a man has had a similar experience in the journey of life. The author of Ecclesiastes describes many of the mirages which tempt men, but which prove to be "vanities." Happy is he who accepts the invitation of Christ to take of that water whereof if a man drink he shall never thirst again. (John 4: 14.)

An Aid to the Helmsman.

A scientific journal describes a new apparatus which has been designed to simplify the duty of "the man at the wheel" on board ship. It consists of an illumination of the mariner's compass. By an arrangement of lenses and mirrors a ray of light extends from the centre to the outer edge of the compass. It can be set in any direction, but, once set, it does not move until readjusted. It is intended that this ray shall be parallel with the lines of the ship when she is proceeding on her proper course. Another set of lenses and mirrors throws another ray on the card, which follows the course of the card, and so indicates the course the ship is taking. Thus, all the helmsman has to do, when his proper course has been set, is to keep the two rays of light together, as he will know that when they diverge, the ship is out of her course. Any man who can handle the rudder will thus be able to steer the ship correctly, even if he cannot read the compass, or does not know toward what point the ship is going. The ray of light set by his commander is sufficient, and all he has to do is to keep the ray of his course in line with it. The Christian's duty is much of the same kind. He need not concern himself with abstruse doctrines and speculative theories; his duty is to have his life in unison with the teaching and example of the Lord (1 Timothy, 1: 4).

A Hesitating Bride.

A young couple presented themselves, a few days ago, at the court-house at Omaha, Neb., and stated their wish to be married. The necessary affidavits were drawn up and signed, but, as the judge who was to perform the ceremony was engaged in the adjoining court in trying a case, the young folks were told that they must wait till he was at liberty. To pass away the time they strolled into the court and listened to the case on trial. It happened to be a wife's petition for divorce and told a pathetic story of cruelty and desertion. When it was finished and the judge was ready to perform the wedding ceremony, the prospective bride said she did not want to be married. The young man who accompanied her was startled and as she persisted, became greatly distressed. He took her into a private room, which the Judge courteously placed at their disposal, and pleaded with her. He must have reassured her, for after half-an-hour they reappeared, and the girl announced herself willing to have the ceremony performed. It was done, but the bridegroom told one of the officers confidentially that he had a hard time, as the girl had "felt afraid to risk it, after hearing the case in court." As he probably pointed out to her, a woman's risk in marriage is determined by the character of the man to whom she gives herself. It is a pity that people so seldom take that view when deciding whether to give themselves to the world or to Christ. God's promise is, "Fear not, for thou shalt not be ashamed: neither be thou confounded; for thou shalt not be put to shame . . . For thy maker is thy husband; the Lord of Hosts is his name." (Isa. 54: 4–5.)

PRINCESS KAIAULANI, CLAIMANT TO THE HAWAIIAN THRONE.

Delayed by Barnacles.

Admiral Gherardi, who has just arrived in Washington from his cruise in the Pacific, brought information which will be useful to the constructors of the Naval Department. He says that the bottoms of the ships of his squadron are covered with minute barnacles. As the cruise was a short one, the barnacles had not time to attain the huge growths which are sometimes found in ships that have been long in the Pacific, but they were large enough to seriously retard the voyage. The speed attained during the latter part of the voyage was less by two knots an hour than that of five months before, and the cause of the difference was the presence of the barnacles on the hulls. The delay involved a loss of money as well as of time. The fuel burned on the voyage from San Francisco to Hampton Roads cost $120,000, which is a much larger sum than would have been needed if the voyage had been performed in the normal time. The ships will have to be put in a dry dock and have the marine growths scraped off, before they will be fit for duty. The Admiral recommends that as these barnacles do not adhere to metal, all new ships should be protected by teak, sheathed with copper, as is done in England. If there were some means of similarly protecting the Church, she would make greater progress. Men attach themselves to her, whose teaching and conduct impede her advance, and like the barnacles on the ships, they are most numerous when she is in peaceful waters, not when she is in storm and stress. Even in Apostolic times there were some of whom Paul said, "Many walk of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are enemies of the Cross of Christ." (Phil. 3: 18 19.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Messrs. Veazie and Geach have been meeting with much success in their work in Kansas. At Kensington the meetings were large and had the support of all denominations. Over fifty persons, about half of whom were adults, signed pledge cards to begin Christ's service.

About twenty conversions are reported as the result of the religious interest in the University of Denver, consequent on the Day of Prayer for Colleges. Nearly ninety per cent. of the students in the College of Liberal Arts and the preparatory school have taken a decided stand as Christians.

The Presbyterian Church of Fulton, Ill., has just passed through a season of refreshing, in which more than sixty persons of all ages, many of them heads of families, have manifested a desire for the new life. The work is largely due to the faithful efforts of Rev. W. A. Botell, the recently appointed synodical evangelist.

In reply to certain criticisms of the management of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, it is stated authoritatively and proved by accounts which have been audited, that only one twentieth of the income is expended in administrative channels. Nineteen twentieths go directly to the missionary work. This shows how economically the great work of the Board is conducted.

The Board of Managers of the American Bible Society made grants of books at its recent meeting of the value of $4,858. A letter was received from the Society's agent in Colombia, reporting that the people who had obtained Bibles were prevented by the priests from reading them. The managers appropriated $19,396 for the promotion of the work in foreign lands.

The West Side Noonday Prayer-meeting in New York celebrated its seventeenth anniversary, recently at its rooms, 281 Greenwich Street, Rev. C. H. Yatman delivered an address on prayer, and spiritual songs were rendered by Miss Nellie E. Tookes, Mrs. Sarah Manley, and Messrs. Blauvelt and Simonson. During the period that the meetings have been continued over 90,000 have attended. Visitors were present at the anniversary from the Fulton Street and old John Street meetings.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services in Worcester, Mass., terminated with an immense thanksgiving meeting in Mechanics' Hall. The pastors whose churches had joined in the movement were present to participate in the rejoicing over the great harvest of souls. It is computed that more than than one thousand have begun a new life at these meetings. Many remarkable testimonies were given of the work of the Holy Spirit in the various congregations. All the evangelical churches of the city will receive large additions.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman commenced his services at Springfield, Ohio, with a great meeting, at which 1,800 persons were present, many of them non-church-goers. A large choir, composed of about 300 representatives of the local churches, assisted. It was announced that services would be held every evening in the City Hall for business men daily at noon, for women in the afternoon, and for children twice a week. At least twenty churches of several denominations are working together harmoniously, and there have been many conversions.

The inquiry as to the burning of the Girls' College at Marsovan, which as stated in our issue of March 1, was being held, has been conducted by the Governor is an unfriendly spirit. There was an evident desire to shield the guilty parties. An attempt has even been made to fix the responsibility on the inmates of the College and two of the native professors have been thrown into prison. The animus of the Governor against the Christians could not have taken a more ridiculous form than that of charging those innocent people with crimes so obviously committed by their enemies.

Rev. A. E. Thompson of Yankton, S. D., has been laboring at Howard for some time in connection with the Congregational Church. His first efforts were directed to the members of churches who were aroused to earnest efforts for the conversion of souls. The first evidence of results was in the Sunday Schools where many of the young people were brought in. Afterward the work spread through the whole town and on one day (Friday) every store, office and shop in the town, with one exception closed, and the meetings were thronged all day with eager seekers. Every church in the town has received accessions.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE RAISING OF JAIRUS'S DAUGHTER.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, March 12th, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D.

THERE were three persons raised from the dead by our Lord. It will be profitable for us to study the narratives in their logical, which is possibly at the same time their chronological, order. The first case to which attention is called is that of the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue. We shall consider especially the narrative given by the evangelist Mark 5: 22, 24, 35-43. The account is also given in Matt. 9: 18-26, and in Luke 8: 41, 42, 49-56. It is fitting, however, at the outset, to say a few words about these three miracles as a whole. They have always been regarded, and rightly, as among the mightiest proofs of divine power on the part of our Lord. No power except it come from God can call back the spirit of the departed and animate again the dust of the dead. Spinoza, the great Jewish philosopher and sceptic of the 17th century, said that if it could be proved to him that Christ raised one from the dead all his objections to the divinity of Christ and to the inspiration of the gospels would be at once removed. In many of our Lord's miracles the cannot be definitely traced. This is true in regard to the relation between health and sickness; one condition often lies very close to the other, and it is difficult accurately to trace the transition from one to the other. The same remark will apply to the relation between storms and calms; they constantly alternate in the varying moods of seas and oceans. In the natural course of events tempests cease and are followed by calms. These results might be secured without any miraculous interposition on the part of Christ. Attention has also been called to the fact that water transmutes itself, by various agencies, into wine. The peasants in the south of France, during the proper season for the growth of the grape, often say when the rain falls, "The wine is falling from the sky." The same law is illustrated in the multiplication of the loaves which fed the thousands. In that case there was simply the acceleration of the process which is continually observed. Nature is all the while multiplying seeds of grain; nature is full of analogies illustrative of the same law. The single kernel deposited in the ground by the husbandman, in harmony with the same law, may become thirty, sixty or a hundred kernels. But when we come to the miracles of raising the dead we enter an entirely different region of thought and of law; we come into contact with an entirely different class of facts. We all know that the gulf between life and death is so immense that apart from divine interposition it is impassable. Between existence and non-existence the opposition is not relative but absolute. It is, therefore, quite right to regard these miracles as unimpeachable witnesses to our Lord's complete divinity.

The Natural and the Supernatural

The Majesty of the Worker.

It is fitting that we emphasize the ease with which Christ performed these miracles. There is not on his part any painful effort; there is no delay; there is no period of agonizing prayer. It is as easy for Christ to raise the dead as it is to utter a command concerning events of the most common kind. One cannot but feel as he stands before Christ, while he is calling back the dead to life, that he is beside the One who in the morning of creation said, "Let light be, and light was." The contrast between Elijah and Christ in this respect is very marked. When Elijah raised the son of the widow at Zarepath, he had to prostrate himself upon the dead form; he had to pray and pray again; [illegible] Thus, after delay and effort, life began to stir in the body of the dead child. Not otherwise [illegible] Here also there is delay; there is effort; there is trial, and there is a period of doubt as well as of difficulty. But not so with Christ. He speaks the word and immediately power accompanies the word and the dead are raised.

Another characteristic of these miracles, is the wonderful tenderness which Christ showed in the selection of the persons whom he raised from the dead. There are, as we have seen, three raisings from the dead. Who were the persons thus raised? The first was the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue; she was the only daughter, and possibly an only child. The hearts of her father and mother were bound up in the life of their only daughter; but, beloved as she was, she died. Her father, just previous to her death, hastened from the side of his pale, suffering and dying child to and secure his help. There are but few stories even on the pages of sacred history which so charm us with their beauty, and thrill us with their interest as does this narrative. Its simple pathos melts its way into our hearts, and every parent interprets it in the light of parental love. Every true man must be touched by this story, as well as every true father. This "one only daughter," in the home of Jairus, was the sunshine and music of his heart. It is ever so that the objects of our joy are the possibilities of our pain. Sooner or later every great love may be changed into a correspondingly great sorrow.

Just here it will be profitable to notice what critics call a contradiction in the narrative. Critics of this character show marvelous ingenuity in the discovery of supposed contradictions among the evangelists. If objectors would spend half the energy in a careful study of the inspired record which they spend in discovering alleged discrepancies they would find that their supposed contradictions are really sublime and divine harmonies. Because in this case the evangelist Matthew represents the father as saying that his daughter is even now dead, and Mark that she "lieth a striking English idiom used to set forth the fact expressed in Latin by the phrase common still, in extremis, and because Luke speaks of her as "a dying," these critics have said that we have a direct contradiction. Surely nothing is easier to adjust than these supposed differences. Nothing could be more natural than that the father would use in his ignorance of the exact fact at the time of his speaking, all the expressions which all the evangelists record. He left his beloved daughter at her last gasp; her life was then ebbing away, and when he reached the side of Christ he could not tell with certainty whether or not she was then living. Perplexed as to the real state of the case, he doubtless used all the expressions which the various evangelists have put into his mouth.

This man was a ruler of the synagogue. The evangelist Matthew speaks of him generally as "a certain ruler"; the two latter evangelists give us his name and identify him more accurately as one of the prefects of the synagogue. It is almost certain that the synagogue was that of Capernaum in which place Jesus then was. It is not, therefore, impossible that this ruler was one of the deputation which afterward came to the Lord on behalf of the heathen centurion. On this present occasion, however, he goes to Jesus as we have seen, on behalf of his own child. Christ at once yielded to but there was delay upon the journey. The large crowd which had gathered about Christ was itself a cause of delay. There are often crowds about Christ still; crowds which may prevent us from bringing the sick to him even as was true in the days of his flesh. There was delay also on this occasion when Christ started for the ruler's house. He had not gone far when a woman presses her way through the crowd and touches the hem of his garment. Christ turns himself about and asks, "Who touched me?" You remember that the disciples reply, in substance, "Master, that is a very strange question, for many are pressing about you." But Christ said with equal tenderness and authority, "somebody hath touched me." There was a touch of faith which Christ immediately recognized, and which at once secured healing power. Thank God, Christ can still be touched with the feeling of our infirmities. A further delay was cause by the conversation which resulted from this miracle. The heart of the father we can well suppose was enduring agony while this delay lasted. We can well imagine that the father's heart was upon his dying child in his saddened home, and that he was most impatient because of this delay. All of us are obliged to experience some elements of this We must not suppose, however, that delays are denials on the part of Christ. He waits only that he may find the fittest time for the display of his mercy. The Lord has all eternity at his command. He is never in haste. and he never delays too long.

Help in a Crisis.

At this point in the narrative we have an account of the coming of the messengers from the father's home. They pronounce the unspeakably sad words, "Thy daughter is dead, why troublest thou the Master any further?" I do not suppose that this message was intended for our Lord's ears, but for the father's only. The Lord was then engaged in speaking to the woman, but he heard the words; his ear is quick to catch the faintest tones expressive of the sorrows of his children. We are told that "as soon as he heard the word that was spoken he saith to the ruler of the synagogue, 'Be not afraid, only believe.'" These messengers probably had faith sufficient to believe that Christ could raise up the maiden although in the last stage of life, that he could fan the dying spark of life into a bright flame; but they did not seem to have believed that when that spark was entirely extinguished it would be possible for Christ again to enkindle it. Their faith was gone; perhaps the father's was going, and just at that moment our Lord spoke his gracious words of encouragement. Doubtless, as Dean Trench suggests, we ought to emphasize the words, "as soon as." The thought is that the very moment that doubt began to take the place of faith in the father's mind the Lord gave him this word of encouragement and hope. I thank the Lord Jesus for these words, "Be not afraid, only believe." Oh, this was Tenderness Indeed!

At that critical moment in his experience came the encouraging exhortation from the lips of Christ. How many fathers and mothers have gone through times of trial when they needed just such a message as this from the blessed Lord. A sick son or daughter, a wayward son or daughter, will test the faith of parents until that faith is but a flickering spark. Then such a word as this from Christ will cause it to become a flame, scattering darkness and doubt and illumining heart and home. Have any of you been pleading with Christ for strength and grace in crucial experiences? Listen then today and you will hear him say, with the matchless sweetness of his loving voice, "Be not afraid, only believe." What precious assurances believers have of Christ's sympathy and help in time of trial.

These messengers quite misunderstood Christ when they said, "Trouble not the Master." Doubtless they were honest in their spirit and speech; but they were quite mistaken in their judgment of his character. Many men now in a spirit of unbelief say, "Trouble not the Master;" others carried away by the spirit of the mocking secularist say, "Trouble not the Master;" and others engrossed in the trivial things of life say, "Trouble not the Master;" and still others far down in the depths of despondency say with mingled doubt and despair, "Trouble not the Master." They all misunderstand alike their own privilege and the Lord's purpose. Forever silenced be the spirit that leads men because of their ignorance of Christ's love to use the language of these messengers. There can be no trouble on our part too insignificant to escape his notice. We honor him when we cast ourselves and our burdens upon his mighty and gentle heart.

In the Desolated Home.

We follow this strange group as they hasten toward the ruler's home. At last his home is reached. What does our Lord find on his arrival? A large, noisy and tumultous company. You are aware that it was the custom of the Jews to bury their dead, if possible, on the day of their death, or on the day following. You know also that they were accustomed to have large numbers of hired mourners; the number depending upon the wealth and station of the family. These mourners were ready to weep, and to lament, and to shout and to howl, according to the instruction and remuneration which they received. They sang aloud of the virtues of the deceased, and in doleful strains mourned with family and with friends. Minstrels also added their noise to the general confusion till the air was often rent with the wailings of hired or real mourners. All such manifestation of grief is utterly distasteful to persons of refined feelings. We have in the Oriental funerals of to-day evidences of the continuance of these customs. The Irish, in their wakes, give us modern representations of this wretched Oriental custom. But our Lord at once rebuked these loud expressions of grief. This he did because there was the maiden as if she were to remain in the power of death. While she was truly dead and not in a swoon, she was so soon to be restored to life, that she ought to be spoken of as asleep, rather than dead. Our Lord used similar language of Lazarus, although he meant to teach that he was really dead. In the presence of Christ's fullness of life and power, all the dead may be spoken of as asleep, hence the noise of this tumultous group was utterly out of place. These mourners laughed him to scorn, showing clearly that in their belief the maiden was not only then dead, but was ever so to remain. Real mourning Christ will always respect; tears are not unmanly; they are not unchristian; but the man who wipes his eye when he sheds no tear, because he would produce in others the impression that he is sympathetic, is false to himself and an abomination to Christ. Christ had no sympathy with unreality; none with cant; none with hypocrisy of whatever kind and wherever found.

No Reason to Lament

There was still another reason why these mourners should be driven out; they were not proper witnesses of so sublime and august a spectacle as soon was to be seen. Christ, therefore, dismisses them. There are always those who have no eyes to see Christ's noblest works, and no hearts to feel his tenderest words. This is as true to-day as when Christ was upon the earth. Only five persons are the

the three chosen disciples—Peter, James and John—and the father and mother of the maiden. Dean Trench calls attention to the fact that these disciples were the elect of the elect that they were the flower and the crown of the Apostolic band; and others have spoken of the fact that they were witnesses not only of this miracle, but of the glories of the transfiguration and the agonies of the garden. They were the chosen three within the circle of the chosen twelve. The father and mother must also be witnesses of the great miracle and sublime mystery. The father had prayed that Christ would come to preserve his child from death Christ could have healed the maiden without coming, and after coming, he could have called her back to life without putting his hand upon her; but he has lessons to teach by all the acts performed in connection with this miracle. Behold the scene. The noisy mourners are driven out. The silence of death broods in the darkened home. Christ, his three disciples, and the father and mother, are beside the couch of the dead maiden. It is a wonderful moment; no one of these five witnesses could ever forget this experience. It was important that Christ should show the reality of his relation as the Lord of life to this maiden as the subject of death. He, therefore, takes the child by the hand; he speaks to her two words—marvelous words, life-giving words, words accompanied by divine power—"Talitha Cumi." These are Aramaic words. Mark, with his characteristic vividness, records them in their original form and then interprets them, "Maiden arise." What

A Marvelous Moment!

What a sublime sight now greets us! Could we but look for a moment into that room where the maiden of twelve lies dead with her peaceful face on her pillow, the three disciples, the father and mother, and the Lord Jesus beside her; we would certainly stand there with bated breath. Look! the maiden is springing to her feet at the touch of Christ's hand and at the sound of his voice! We are distinctly told that her spirit came again, "and she arose straightway and walked." Our Lord, careful of the proprieties of every occasion, commanded that meat should be given her; a command very necessary, as her parents in their indescribable joy might have forgotten so needful a provision.

Blessed is that home where Jesus comes as the associate and Saviour of parents and children! Blessed are those children on whom the hand of Christ rests in benediction! I would rather have my children the children of God than have them kings and princes of the earth, if they were without God and without hope. I would rather have Christ come to my home to glorify it with his presence, to sanctify it with his purity, to illumine it with his light, and to beautify it with his life than have as my guest the proudest scion of the loftiest royalty. Christ was always a practical friend in every home in which he came. I often think that his greatest glory is seen in his attention to little things. We sometimes think that we cannot be great unless we do what we call some great thing for God and for man, but true greatness is often best shown in doing little things in a great way, in a royal manner, and with a Christ-like spirit. By commanding the parents to give food to their risen daughter Christ would prove to them that her recovery was real, that she was not a ghost but real flesh and blood, their own beloved daughter now rescued from the power of death and restored to their love. Behold her as she sits before them, her heart throbbing with life, her eye bright with hope, her cheek flushed with health, and her whole soul glowing with love to her deliverer!

Saddened Homes.

And now we have run over this story together in this simple, familiar and, I trust, somewhat practical way. Let us see what lessons naturally come out of this narrative. First, we see that sorrow comes to the homes of the great as well as to the homes of the humble. This man was a ruler of the synagogue, a leader of public service, a man of influence religiously, socially, and politically, for the relation between the church and the state in those days was very close. He would be a magistrate, speaking civilly. Speaking religiously, he was a ruler of the synagogue, a man of prominence and a man of power; and yet sorrow came to his home. Death comes as the old Latin poet sang long ago:

> Death comes with equal step,
> Knocks at the palace gate
> And at the cottage door.

He will come to your home; he will come to mine. His dark shadow may fall across our threshold when least we think it. None will be exempt. There are many in this house now who wear the signs of mourning. Death has been to your homes. But, beloved, there are sadder things than death: a dissipated son is often worse than a dead son; a wayward daughter makes sadder hearts than a dead daughter. Oh, is there a son here this morning, who is bringing down his father and mother with sorrow to the grave! Perhaps there is some boy away from home who has turned his back upon his mother and his mother's God. I beseech you to come as the prodigal came—come confessing your sin, come back again to your Father's house.

We learn, as a second lesson, that Christ is the true source of help in every sorrow which may come to our homes and our hearts. Doubtless this man waited long, waited to the very last, before he went to Christ, waited until the flame of life was flickering and just about to go out. Too many imitate him; they will not they wait the darkness of midnight. Oh, it is all wrong! I love to see men and women even if it be at the eleventh hour—even if it be in the darkness of midnight; it is better that you should come even though you should do only what the sailor said he did, "Throw the fag ends of your life into the face of God." But how much better to come in strength, in health, in youth, and in the glory of manhood. Have Christ a guest in your home when all is merry, while the ringing laughter of children, the sweetest music ever heard in the home, is heard throughout the entire dwelling. Come, then, to Christ, and when the darkness comes he will be near, you will not have to pray in the language of the beautiful hymn, "Abide with me;" but you will be able to sing "Lo, thou art with me, even as thou hast promised."

Go to God in the Sunshine,

Now, notice this lesson at the close, that Christ is never appealed to in vain. It seemed to be in vain; for a while that father's faith was greatly tried. He might have asked, "Oh, why do those people keep him from my door? She is dying; may be it is too late!" How his heart is going from that crowd of people to his home. How he thought of that pale face. Ah, what it is to have a sick child! "Why will these people crowd about my Lord? My only hope is in Christ, if he will only come." Yet the people crowd about, then there is another crowd on the street. There is that poor woman. Well, he would seem sympathetic to her; "but why does she keep the Lord from my sick daughter?" Ah, troubled father, delay is not denial, Christ knows the fittest time, he will come at the right time, delay is not denial. You never go to Christ in vain for yourself or for others. That maiden is now dead; Jairus is dead; the mother is dead; the disciples are dead; but Jesus Christ lives. He passes up and down these aisles. He goes through these pews, and he says to every parent and to every child, "What wilt thou that I should do to thee?"

Oh, invite Christ to your home; invite Christ to your heart; and have him as your constant guest for his name's sake. Amen.

ONWARD.

ONWARD in the conflict,
Of a daily life,
Fighting for the Master
Through the storm and strife.

Let each day be upward
Towards our home above,
Look to God for guidance
For our God is love.

Through our daily trials
Let our motto be,
I can surely conquer
Through Christ who strengthens me.

So let us go onward
With smiles and love for all,
Till at last we listen
To His loving call.—L. D. H.

ALMOST.

Written for The Christian Herald.

So near the door and the door stood wide,
Close to the fort—but not inside;
Near to the fold yet not within,
Almost resolved to give up sin.
Almost persuaded to count the cost,
Almost a Christian, and yet lost.
Saviour, I come, I cry unto thee,
Oh, let not those words be true of me.
I want to come to the point to-day;
Oh, suffer me not to turn away.
Give me no rest till my soul shall be Within the Refuge, safe in thee.

"WHEREFORE DIDST THOU DOUBT?"

MATTHEW 14: 31.

LONG and dark were the days,
The time for hoping seemed past;
But the sun shone forth and his rays
Lightened the gloom at last:
And I thought of my Saviour's words,
Then my terrors were put to rout:—
"O thou of little faith,
Wherefore didst thou doubt?"

Futile seemed prayer and tears,
In blindness I groped my way,
My soul was troubled by fears
Haunting it night and day.
But oh! when the trust came back!
When the fears were all shut out!
"O thou of little faith,
Wherefore didst thou doubt?"

PAULINE TESTIMONY.

The Apostle Paul's Expectation of the Second Advent and the Millennium.

BY REV. W. ERITH.

THE writings of the great Apostle of the Gentiles contain frequent references to this subject which, as we have seen in former articles, occupies a place in the Old Testament, and in the teaching of Christ himself.

In Col. 3: 4, we have these words: "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, ye also shall appear with him in glory." Here the great cardinal truth of the apostolic ministry is introduced; and in a connection and manner which seems to lead to the conclusion that Paul would have it held as a principle of the Christian faith, operative on the hopes and motives of those who form the Body of Christ on earth, and not "held in solution," as a mere theological opinion of no practical value in life. How different the teachings of some, even devout men, who affirm that death is the hope of the believer! But without noting all the passages in Paul's writings in which this precious doctrine is taught, we shall select only the more prominent in the epistles: "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? is it not even ye, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?" (1 Thess. 2: 19.) Who can fail to see here, that in the apostle's regard this doctrine was operative for good, in giving a holy stimulus to consecrated service in the church on earth? Paul did indeed then rejoice in this their spiritual health and prosperity: "Ye are our glory and joy." (Ver. 20.) Still he regarded the coming of the Lord as a certain event which must take place; and at which, whenever it did, they should be his crown of rejoicing; no utopian hope or groundless anticipation to him in the midst of the toils and hardships of his ministry!

But in chapter 4: 13—18, he so fully states the Advent in relation to the rapture of the church, that few, one would think, could fail to see that the Holy Ghost intended the doctrine to be one of the cardinal tenets of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." (R. V.) And this being so, those who live in subsequent days should not fail to "hold fast the form of sound words" as they have been delivered unto us! Mark the words, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God!" Now whatever figures may be used here, the words—the Lord himself—are literal, and cannot be, we think, understood but to express a distinct visible personality, corresponding to the words of the angel in Acts 1: 11. To take them in any other way is to do violence to the plain terms of human language. And this interpretation is supported by the expressive and tender words of the last verse: "Wherefore comfort one another with these words!" Thus the certain return of our blessed Lord was to be made the source of comfort to all mourners suffering under domestic bereavement, both then and now.

Now in his Second Epistle to the Church, he makes the same allusion to the Advent: (chap. 2: 1.) "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Here Paul shows them that his appearance to execute judgment on the Man of Sin—the Wicked (One) would not take place till after the apostacy and revelation of this dreadful Person—the Antichrist of 1 John 2: 18, and the Beast of Rev. 17: 3.

Here, perhaps, it is necessary to note that, although Jesus will not appear in his glorious Epiphany of regal majesty, for the destruction of Antichrist and his confederate armies, in the valley of Jehoshaphat ("as the stone cut out of the mountains without hands," Dan. 2: 45) till the apostacy is ripe for judgment; yet he will appear to his waiting ones, those of his Church, who are, like the wise virgins, ready—"having their loins girt, and their lamps burning, and they, like unto men who wait for their Lord," and take them up before, and therefore out of, the great tribulation; while the worldly, the careless and the selfish, like the foolish virgins, will be left to pass through the tribulation, "saved, yet so as by fire." We think this is evident from Rev. 14: 1–5, etc., for these 144,000 are evidently a part of the Church; for they are saved; and they appear also to be taken away first, before the rest, because they have lived in closer communion with God—maintained a virgin character; verse 4, "the first-fruits unto God and the Lamb."

Now the first fruits are cut out of the field, and taken up unto the Lord before the full harvest is gathered. But yet the sheaf of first-fruits forms part of the whole harvest. (See Lev. 23: 10–11.)

THE PROMISES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing March 26 Matt 24: 35; Isaiah 40: 8.

THE value of a promise depends on certain obvious conditions. Much depends on the character and power of the person making it. Much, too, on the conditions attached to it, and much on the desirability of the thing promised. We pay no regard to the promise of an untrustworthy man, or of a man who promises what he has not the power to give, or to a promise conditional on our doing something impossible to us, or to the promise of something we do not want. But if we are in urgent need of help, and that help is promised freely by some one abundantly able to render it and who is absolutely reliable—then the promise is of inestimable value. So the Christian opens his Bible, as one goes to a boundless, inexhaustible treasury, and feels that his confidence is justified. He finds there promises adapted to his every need. Widely as his circumstances in the nineteenth century differ from those of the men who lived in the age when the promise was given, he finds that the blessing promised is that which he needs. The real necessities of man are the same in every age. In all times, men have need of consolation in sorrow and bereavement, strength for the performance of duty, wisdom in the perplexities of life and the assurance of life beyond the grave. All these are promised and the measure of their fulfilment is, "According to your faith be it unto you."

But there is a noticeable development in the promises of the Bible; and the Christian is encouraged to "covet earnestly the best gifts." The wealth and prosperity promised to the patriachs and the early founders of the Jewish nation are not repeated in the New Testament. As a father would be surprised and pained by his son of mature years asking him for the toys which he naturally desired as a child, so God expects from his children of this later age requests for higher blessings than mere temporal and material gifts. They have been taught to regard their life here as a period of training and discipline, and the promises of the New Testament are based on the assumption that the relative value of the unseen and eternal with the seen and temporal has been perceived. It is not of wealth and honors that Christ speaks. His promises are of another order. The pure in heart are to see God; they that hunger after righteousness are to be filled; he that overcometh is promised hidden manna and that he shall be a pillar in the temple of God. The assurance is given that God cares for his children, that their temporal necessities will be supplied and it is expected that no more is desired. As to worldly success and the good things of life, Christ dismisses the thought with a phrase, "After all these things do the Gentiles seek." He expects better things of his disciples. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and all these things shall be added unto you." They are matters of secondary importance. Bear injustice, suffer wrong, do not resent injuries, give yourselves no concern about worldly things, set your affections on things above, beside which all else is insignificant. On this higher level the promises stretch out in boundless prospect and the spiritual world becomes the only real world in which we are to live and move and have our being.

THE INTERNATIONAL C. E. CONVENTION

THE following communication from Mr. Ames will be of interest to Christian Endeavorers all through the country:

As the date of the great Christian Endeavor Convention draws near, the thoughts of many thousand young people, throughout the United States and Canada, naturally turn towards Montreal, that foremost city of the Dominion, chosen to play the part of host for the International gathering of 1893. Letters are daily pouring in upon the Secretary of the Montreal Committee, showing how widespread is the interest, and how general the determination on the part of Endeavorers everywhere to be well represented on Canadian soil next July. A mighty invasion of Canada is expected, and the loyal inhabitants are preparing not to repel, but to receive it with open arms.

Hotel accommodation in Montreal is not ample, but the citizens will by their hospitality, more than make up this deficiency. The method of allotment will be as follows: the Hotel Committee will locate the various State delegations "en bloc," through their respective State excursion managers. To this end one canvas of the city for suitable lodgings, has already been made, and a second, more thorough, is about to be commenced. Up to date 13,000 allocations have been secured, and nearly as many more may be expected, before the first of June. The city will then be portioned into sections, each section having a suitable headquarters or meeting place within its limits. As a State excursion manager makes application for a definite number of lodgings, a section adequate to his requirements will be assigned. Thus numbers of the same party need not be separated but by a block or two at most, and on arrival will be distributed from a centralpoint near the lodgings. To enable this plan to be prosecuted to a successful issue, it is desirable that each Endeavorer send his name to his or her State excursion manager, to be forwarded by him with the others to the Hotel Committee at Montreal. To render less difficult the problem of local transportation, arrangements will be made to provide, near the place of meeting, ample lunches for a large proportion of those in attendance on the meetings. Two large meeting places, the Gov't Drill shed, capable of holding ten thousand, and a tent of nearly equal capacity, on opposite sides of the same square, will accommodate simultaneous meetings with a programme of equal attractiveness in each. Mr. Burleigh of Rochester will again be the cornettist, and Mr. Lindsay of St. Louis, one of those who lead the singing. The programme is not yet officially announced, but its strength and attractiveness will be greater than ever before. All Endeavorers who can come, should come, and all who do come, will be made heartily welcome, and be well cared for, by the Committee of Montreal.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

THE Provincial Union for Ontario and Quebec will hold a Convention at Woodstock on March 30.—The Union of the Los Angeles Association of Southern California has been holding its first Convention at Alhambra. A very large number of delegates attended. The proceedings indicated an enthusiasm in Union work beyond all expectation. One of the results of the Convention has been to convince the individual Unions that the sister Unions are in active sympathy and in friendly rivalry for the first place for efficient organization and earnest work.—A successful system of Union visits is being adopted in Massachusetts. The Unions connected with the twenty churches composing the Merrimac River Association have been paying and receiving visits to each other. Haverhill Union received a visit from the Methuen and Lawrence Unions and the Lawrence young people had a call from those of Lowell. Many valuable friendships are thus formed as no introduction is needed beyond that of membership in a sister Union. The visits have been mutually enjoyed.

THE JERUSALEM Y. M. C. A.

JUST outside the Jaffa Gate and abutting on the old wall of Jerusalem is the Y. M. C. A. building, a picture of which appears on this page. It is not a very imposing or commodious edifice, but standing on a site of hallowed associations, it appeals strongly to Christian interest. It is a deeply gratifying fact than an institution which has been so useful in Christian lands, should have gained a foothold in the city whose very name awakens a responsive echo in the heart of every follower of the Master. The Turkish Government, which controls the city, would have closed it, having misunderstood its aims. The governor thought it was a political institution, and it was necessary to explain to him, as Christ explained to that other governor in the same city, nineteen centuries ago, that the kingdom it represented was a kingdom not of this world. Understanding that the Association devoted itself to the promotion of morality and righteousness, and did not concern itself with politics, the Turkish governor consented to the work being continued. It has already sixty-four members, and the rooms are open daily. Mr. Najib Jamal, of Jerusalem, who is now taking a University course in New York, says that it is likely to do much toward propagating Christianity among the young men of the city. It has a reading-room, to which many friends send papers, and is building up a library by the same generous means. It has also added a room for chess-players, which is a strong attraction to the young men of the city who are apt to be tempted by their love of the game to visit the numerous saloons in the neighborhood, where accommodations for playing it are provided. In Jerusalem, however, as elsewhere, the chief object of the Association, which is never subordinated, is the spiritual welfare of the members.

THE C. E. OF SYRACUSE, N. Y.

THE annual meeting of the Syracuse, N. Y., Christian Endeavor Union was held recently at the Fourth Presbyterian Church. From the reports given, it appeared that during the past year seven new societies had been organized. The Union is now composed of thirty-six societies with a membership of 3164 young people. The attendance at the meetings held by the Union during the past year has been the largest in the history of the organization. At one of the meetings fully 1000 young people were in attendance. The officers elected for the ensuing year are: Thomas R. Jordan, President; Carl Sutter, Vice-President; Miss Grace Clark, Recording Secretary; Miss Edith Fuller, Corresponding Sec'y; N. P. EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

Is the Epworth League adapted to country charges? This is a question that has been much discussed. Some consider it a good thing for cities and large towns, but not adapted to churches in the country; but the fact is that some of the most efficient Leagues are found in the rural districts. The Chapter at Nineveh, Pa., a village of only three hundred inhabitants is an instance. It recently raised nearly seven hundred dollars, and entirely renovated the heating arrangements of the church, putting in new steam heaters. The plan whereby they raised so much money, was very ingenious and novel. Saturday afternoons and evenings, many people come in from the surrounding country to sell produce, and also to make purchases. Taking advantage of this fact, the League secured a room, and every Saturday afternoon sold refreshments at reasonable prices. In this way they made the amount needed. The same enterprising Chapter started a weekly prayer-meeting at Hopewell, another appointment upon the same charge. This meeting was sustained in all sorts of weather and has resulted in much spiritual good. The church building at Hopewell needing repair, the Nineveh Chapter headed the subscription list with a donation of $200. In this case, the League in the country has certainly worked well. The department on social life, does much to furnish wholesome and sensible amusement to the young people. Every Chapter seems to take up some special lines of work. That of the First Church, Washington, Pa., supports a native preacher in India, and one of Bishop Thoburn's native preachers in India, is supported by Howlive Chapter, Minn. In Oxford, N. Y., the Chapter rents a pew in the church for the special accommodation of strangers. The League at New Burlington, O., is having a course of lectures, the proceeds being for the purchase of a library, while that of the Hansom Park Church, Omaha, Neb., has assumed the payment of $3,100 for a new pipe organ for the church. Thus in all directions, the League is taking hold of the various forms of church work; acting upon financial, educational and spiritual lines. J. G.

The Conqueror's City.

Alexandria, the "Queen of the East," and the Rival of Ancient Rome—"The Place of the Consuls"—A Great Old-World Metropolis.

N the Mediterranean, twelve miles west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, lies Alexandria, a city which in history has held a proud pre-eminence, equal to that of Nineveh, Babylon and Rome. It was founded 330 years before the birth of the Saviour, by the Macedonian conqueror—upon the site of a small village, called Rhacotis. A little island opposite, called Pharos, was connected with the mainland by a long pier, the idea being to form a deep-water harbor that should be the greatest port of all Egypt.

There is a tradition that Alexander the Great with his own hand traced the ground plans of the ancient city. He foresaw that its proximity to the Egyptian river and the Mediterranean would eventually make it a commanding port for the traffic of the world, and this expectation was eventually fulfilled. He ordered Dinocrates, a famous architect, who had reconstructed the beautiful temple of Diana at Ephesus, to undertake the improvement of the new city and harbor. Among other noble structures then erected was the famous lighthouse upon the Isle of Pharos, which Alexander directed to be named after his friend, Hephæstion. It is impossible to conceive of anything more brilliant and attractive, in a worldly sense, than the city, during the next few succeeding generations. Splendid public buildings, theatres, public groves or gardens, exchanges, libraries and great colleges of philosophy were built, and the city was made beautiful with statuary as a harmonious supplement to its magnificent architecture. Towering above all was the temple of Serapis (the heathen deity, to whom forty-two temples were erected throughout Egypt), worshipped by the Alexandrians as the "giver of great blessings." The main thoroughfares were two hundred feet wide and crossed each other in the centre of the city, which had a population of 600,000.

Pompey's Pillar—erected in honor of a famous prefect of that name, or, as others claim, in honor of Pompey the Great, and still others, to commemorate Emperor Diocletian's mercy in sparing the city after a revolt—is one of the most striking objects in Alexandria, being visible from almost every point. There is a local tradition that Diocletian was so enraged at the resistance of the Alexandrians, that he vowed he would slay them until the blood was upon his horse's knees. He gave orders for the massacre; but before it had progressed very far, his horse stumbled and fell, causing its knees to be dabbled with human blood. Diocletian, accepting this as an omen from the gods, ordered the slaughter to cease. The pillar is a single, red granite shaft, 73 feet high and 8 feet in diameter, resting on a base and crowned by an ornamental capital, the whole being nearly 100 feet high.

When the Roman Emperor, Theodosius, forbade idolatry throughout his empire, a great struggle immediately took place between the Christians and the idolaters in Alexandria. The latter entrenched themselves in the Serapeum, which the Christians besieged. Many lives were sacrificed, but at last the temple of the great idol was carried by assault, and the Christians began the work of demolition. This was a momentous stage in the history of Christianity. In the centre of the temple sat the colossal idol, which embodied the leading attributes of the oldest deities of pagan Greece and Egypt. It was so large that its outstretched hands touched the walls on either side. It was made almost wholly of gold, plate overlaying plate, and the whole studded with precious stones, while on its hands, its knees and its head were the various emblems of worship which the priest of idolatrous generations had devised and placed there. The idol-worshippers stood appalled at the boldness of the Christians, who now prepared to destroy the venerable image; they declared that if Serapis were overthrown, the sea would instantly swallow Alexandria. In vain the Christian Archbishop, Theophilus, urged the destroyers forward; even they were afraid. At last a Roman soldier seized a ladder and axe, and placing the former against the idol, he mounted nimbly and with his whole strength, sunk the battle-axe in the cheek of Serapis! The golden plates fell, clattering on the tiled floor of the temple. Stroke by stroke, he demolished the head and shoulders, and when the crowd, taking courage at his success, finally pulled the idol from its pedestal, it fell with a crash that shook the foundations of the temple. It was the fall of the last and greatest idol within the dominion of Rome.

Alexandria is mentioned many times in connection with events recorded in the New Testament. It was the home of Apollos, the contemporary and friend of Paul. It was the Jews of Alexandria who instigated the rabble at Jerusalem to stone Stephen, the first of the Christian martyrs. Simon of Cyrene, who bore the cross of Christ on the way to Calvary, lived near Alexandria, and was a frequent visitor there. It was the capital of Cleopatra, the beautiful and wicked daughter of Ptolemy Auletes. Moreover, it was not only a great port of commerce, but a seat of learning and philosophy, and contained the finest library then known in the world, which is said to have been burned during the Saracen invasion, about 600 years after the birth of Christ.

The illustration on this page shows the "Place of the Consuls," in modern Alexandria. Nearly all the principal hotels, shops and offices are situated in or near this great square, the centre of which forms a very agreeable promenade. During their tour in the East in 1889, Rev. Dr. Talmage, Mr. Klopsch and party visited Alexandria. They arrived there about the latter part of November, and were deeply impressed with the interesting sights they witnessed during their stay. The city no longer presents the magnificent aspect of ancient times; its walls have crumbled; the Turkish quarter is cramped and uninviting, and many of the noble structures have entirely disappeared. It is still a great port of trade, but like every other city that has come under Turkish domination, its glory has largely departed, and its population is not now one-third what it was when its name was known to the ends of the earth as the "Queen of the East." Its commanding maritime position, however, has sustained its commercial pre-eminence, and it is still the greatest port for the trade of Egypt.

Enjoying Life.

How may we use the world without abusing it? writes Prof. W. G. Blaikie. To this question we may find a good answer in a proverb commonly applied to fire and water, but true of many things beside: "Fire and water are good servants, but ill masters." The world may be a good servant, but it is an ill, ill master.

Use the world as a servant; use it to promote the strength of your body and the elasticity of your mind; use it to increase your power of self-control, your vigor of conscience, your activity in duty, your purpose-like application to the work given you to do, and you will get a blessing. In other words, regulate your reading and your recreation, and your intercourse with society, with a view to making you more ready, cheerful and effective in the service of God and man, and all will be well. Keep the great object of life ever before you: "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever."

Don't Be a Cynic.

THERE is no more disagreeable person than the cynic, who regards everything through green glasses. Beware of cultivating the cynical temper. It is worse than an attack of cholera or the yellow fever. Made up of equal parts of narrowness, suspicion, and malignity, it deserves and receives general reprobation. The curled lip, the sharp and biting speech are its outward manifestations. The habit of doubting your fellow-men, of seeking to prove that they are selfish and hypocritical, and of sneering at their best deeds, will eat like a canker into your own character. You cannot avouch the genuineness of your own manhood by seeking to belittle and discredit your brother. The censorious habit grows unconsciously. Many persons fall into it without even being aware of the fact. Take care that you become not one of them!

TO A SAD MOTHER.

"LET the little ones come unto me,"
Said God's dear Son, so mild,
Who in Bethlehem's lowly manger
Once lay a little child,
Or slept upon his mother's breast,
A babe all undefiled.

'Tis the little lambs that nestle
Closest to the Shepherd's breast,
Who in his arms of tenderness
Are ever gently pressed,
And those he gathers in his arms
Have never need of rest.

The shepherd loved your little lamb
But his messenger was dread,
And your heart seemed almost breaking
When they said, "The child is dead!"
"But we have a dear, new sister,"
The angel-children said.

Christ bids you not to sorrow,
The lamb you have resigned
To the fold of which our Jesus
Is the Shepherd, true and kind,
In pastures green, by waters still
Your yearning love shall find.

PHILLIPS BROOKS' MOTHER.

MANY years ago, a young mother, wishing to make the right start in the training of a young son, sought the counsel of her friend and neighbor, the mother of Phillips Brooks. Mrs. Brooks, after meditating for a moment, said: "I believe I have something to say to you, a young mother, about the management of boys. There is an age when it is not well to follow or question your boy too closely. Up to that time you may carefully instruct and direct him; you are his best friend, he is never happy unless the story of the day has been told; you must hear about his games, his friends, his school—all that interests him must be your interest. Suddenly these confidences cease—the affectionate son becomes reserved and silent, he seeks the intimate friendship of other lads, he goes out; he is averse to telling you where he is going or how long he will be gone. He comes in and goes silently to his room. All this is a startling change to the mother, but it is also her opportunity to practice wisdom by loving and praying for and absolutely trusting her son. The faithful instruction and careful training during his earlier years the son can never forget—that is impossible. Therefore, trust, not only your Heavenly Father, but your son. The period of reserve of which I speak appears to me to be one in which the boy dies and the man is born; his individuality rises up before him and he is dazed and almost overwhelmed by his first consciousness of himself. I have always believed it was then that the Creator was speaking with my sons, and that it was good for their souls to be left alone with him, while I, their mother, stood trembling and praying and waiting, knowing well that the man was evolved from the boy, when the process of the birth was over; that I should have my sons again, and there would be a deeper sympathy than ever between us."

Be Patient with Them.

THERE are moments when we are fretted with the children; their little amusements, their prattle, even the sound of their pattering footsteps, jar discordantly upon us. At such a moment, let us reflect whether it is wise or just to give way to these feelings.

They are such tiny feet!
They have gone such a little way to meet
The years which are required to break
Their steps to evenness, and make Them go more sure and slow.

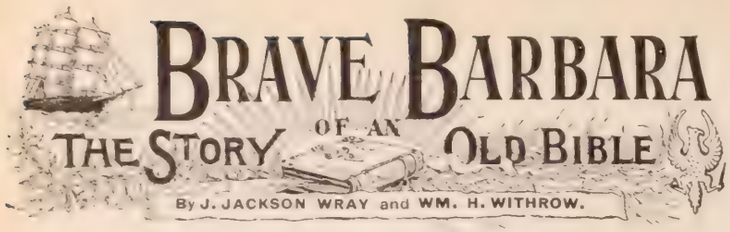
They are such little hands!
Be kind—things are so new, and life but stands
A step beyond the doorway. All around
New day has found
Such tempting things to shine, and so
The hands are tempted oft, you know.

They are such fair, frail gifts!
Uncertain as the rifts
Of light that lie along the sky—
They may not be here by and by.
Give them not love, but more, above
And harder—patience with the love.



CHAPTER III.

THE PALATINES.

THE voyage of the Colleen Bawn, in those old times long before the application of steam shortened the period from months to weeks, and, as now, from weeks to days was profoundly long and wearisome; and we will take the opportunity afforded by those dreary and mainly monotonous months at sea, to tell the story of those Teutonic emigrants, and explain the why and wherefore of their original exodus from the land of their fathers, of their subsequent location in the Emerald Isle, and of their migration from thence to seek a settled home in "The Land of the Setting Sun."

"In that broadly inclusive country of Europe known as Germany, there is a large territory bordering on Bohemia and Bavaria and on both sides of the Rhine, formerly known as the Palatinate. No region on the Continent has suffered more from internal commotions and the strife of war, and yet no district in Germany can surpass it in fertility and productiveness. The word "Palatine" was originally bestowed as an official name, on the great officers of the royal palace, and as the government of the territory was entrusted to members of this class, the country in question was known as the "Palatinate."

In the Palatinate, the evangelical doctrines of John Huss, a reformer and martyr, had at an early period obtained so strong a hold upon the people that all the efforts of the Papacy failed to uproot them; and though the Protestant believers were sorely persecuted, and at times apparently exterminated, the new faith still survived.

When Martin Luther's Gospel propaganda took hold on Germany, Protestantism in the Palatinate got a new lease of life, and the torch of Gospel truth burnt bright and with a clearer flame. As the years went by, the strength of the Papacy was again put forth to extinguish it with blood and fire, but like the light kindled by Latimer and his comrades in England, it could "never be put out."

And so it came to pass that large numbers of the heretical Palatines were driven from house and home, and from the land of their birth. During the war with Germany, in which the Duke of Marlborough won his laurels, a large number of these persecuted Palatine Protestants fled for refuge to his camp, and besought him to take them "anywhere, anywhere out of the reach of their ruthless foe."

Just at that period, the newly-opened colonies of the Western World were inviting to their virgin acres emigrants from the overcrowded East; and the Government in Ireland were anxious to introduce into that unfortunate and sore-misgoverned island any number of Protestant settlers, to swamp the influence of Rome and to secure the overthrow of "the Pope and all his works."

Of the thousands of Palatine refugees, therefore, who had fled to the camp of the English general, seven thousand were brought over to England. Of these, three thousand were ultimately sent to America, a few remained in England, and the rest numbering well-nigh four thousand, were settled in Ireland in or about the year 1710. These latter were located mainly in the province of Munster, on the estate of Lord Southwell, in the neighborhood of Ballygarane, or Ballygran, as it is now called, together with Court-matrick [illegible]

I gather from the record in Tyerman's able and judicious work, "The Life and Times of John Wesley," that these German colonists in [illegible] —were considerately cared for by the British Government of that day. Each man was supplied with a musket, called a "Queen Anne," to protect himself and his family from their possibly unsympathetic and antagonistic neighbors, and from the rebel bands who were in the habit of being more free than welcome in the appropriation of other people's goods. For every man, woman, and child eight acres of land were leased at an annual rental of five shillings an acre, which the government engaged to pay for the first [illegible]

Having no Gospel minister, no regular system of religious worship, these "Palatines" as they came to be popularly called, began rapidly to degenerate. They retained much of the temper and manners of their own country, having small resemblance to the people among whom they lived; but though they were originally a staid, sober, moral people, they became utterly neglectful of all religion, and the rude vices of the Irish peasantry were soon grafted on their social life, and the fruit was, as might be expected, even worse than that of the "evil tree."

For some years matters of morals and religion among the Palatines of Ireland, grew worse and worse. Still, there was ever a faithful few who sighed and cried over the prevailing indifference, intemperance and general departure from goodness and truth. Among these were the Heck family, the Rechels, the Sweitzers, and a few others who kept the flame alive that John Huss and Martin Luther had kindled long before. Specially was this true of one Philip Guier, a noble Christian schoolmaster. Like Milton's Abdiel, he proved faithful among the faithless, and not only so, but gave loud and earnest Gospel witness in the ears of the people.

This fine soul was the teacher of the German school of Ballygarane, and it was under his firm tuition and example that Philip Embury and Barbara Heck were taught; not only to read and write but to "know the truth as it was in Jesus," and to find in it the strength of their heart and the joy of their life. At this time the Methodists had gained a footing in Limerick and Philip Guier found in the new religionists, not only that which was good for his soul, but an access of zeal and anxiety for the salvation of his compatriots, so sorely backslidden from the faith of their forefathers.

In 1752, Guier, who had joined the sorely persecuted little band of Methodists in Limerick, was made a "local preacher," and was appointed to act in that capacity at Ballygarane and the rest of the "Palatinate" generally. The result of all this was simply marvelous. He still kept his school, but devoted his spare hours to preaching; in school, as well as house and street, however, "the Word" was full of life and power, and his pupils, several of whom we have seen on the deck of the Colleen Bawn, became valuable recruits in the Army of the Prince Immanuel, of which he was so brave a soldier, a captain so wise and strong.

A Methodist "Society" was soon established in Ballygarane. Thomas Walsh, another of Guier's pupils, aided his old schoolmaster to "set the Palatine on fire," and afterwards became one of the worthiest and most successful of the heroic band who joined John Wesley in "turning the world upside down." Philip Guier became so beloved that, as one said, he was all but worshiped. The people sent him, if not money, yet flour, oatmeal, bacon, potatoes, etc., and would have almost "plucked out their own eyes" to serve him.

It was with infinite satisfaction that John Wesley visited these Methodist Germans of the Palatine, making brief excursions thither from Limerick and preaching to them with that wondrously simple nerve and vigor that so electrified those who heard him. This is what that great religious reformer says of the Palatine during these better days: "I found much life among these plain, artless, serious people." The whole district was regenerated, "an oath was rarely heard among them, or a drunkard seen."

They had built for themselves a spacious and respectable meeting-house, large numbers were joined in church fellowship, and, says Wesley, "by their diligence they have turned all their land into a garden." Such were the better and brighter times in which the lot of Brave Barbara Heck had fallen. Such was the season of seed-sowing in which her childhood had received the germs of Truth, and had developed them into "first the blade and then the ear" of moral strength and principle to ripen in the fulness of time in the "full corn in the ear," as shown in a life of remarkable force of character and conduct, and high service for [illegible]

But, alas, the days of darkness came ruthlessly on the little colony of Palatines in Ireland, and especially to those of them who had become known and noted for their zeal among the "Swaddlers," as the despised and persecuted Methodists had come to be called by their Romish and infidel neighbors. The fiery and excitable temperament of the sons of Erin, a noble race withal, was much the same as now, and in those days of faction, our new religionists had by no means an easy time of it.

Besides all this, and probably worse than this, the difficulty of "making ends meet," from a domestic point of view became more and more a struggle, and it became necessary for many of them to find homes elsewhere in order to keep a little meal in their all but exhausted barrel—a little oil in their failing cruse. In the earlier days of the settlement in Ireland, the Government had paid their rent, and for some years afterwards the rents demanded of them were moderate, and their earnings left them a margin on which to live.

But in later times rent were greatly raised, many of the tenants were all but starved, and even those who were better able to keep the wolf from the door, saw their limited resources melting away at a rate sadly prophetic of future penury. And so it came to pass that growing numbers of these poor Palatinates, encouraged and even accompanied by their more prosperous, or rather their less poverty-stricken neighbors set their faces towards the new world in search of bread for their children and a home they could call their own.

Amongst the very foremost of these Palatine emigrants, the earliest of these bold pioneers, was the party from Ballygarane and its vicinity of which Philip Embury was the leader, in which Brave Barbara Heck was a dominant force for good; the party which as we have seen, left the Custom's Quay at Limerick and boldly dared the waves of the vast Atlantic on board the little schooner, Colleen Bawn.

Having obtained this historic glimpse of Brave Barbara's forbears and fore-runners; having got an answer to all the curious questions as to when and where and why there came to be any "Irish Palatines" at all, and having told my readers the errand on which the voyagers were bound—all this being needful to make the story clear—we may now return to trace the fortunes of the Colleen Bawn, which was now tossing on a stormy sea in mid-Atlantic.

For some weeks the slow progress of the little ship was not greatly impeded either by adverse winds or exceptionally rough weather, though it may well be imagined that life on board so small a vessel was anything but a pleasant business to those who, until now had been content with the sight of salt water, and had probably never trusted to the ups and downs of even a tidal river.

Captain O'Connor, however, did not cease to speak cheerily and confidently to the motley group of voyagers he carried, some of whom were fearsome and timorous, others were downright ill with dread and the sore sickness which continued and increased thereby; some of them seemed to have sunk into a silent and half-helpless lethargy, and their sunken eyes and pallid features bore witness to their distress alike of body and mind.

In the midst of all these depressing surroundings, a little few, notably Philip Embury, Paul Heck, the Sweitzers, and most of all, brave Barbara, not only possess their souls in patience, but exhibited a self-control, a cheery courage born of hope and faith, that did much to sustain their weaker comrades, and to elicit from the harassed skipper many expressions of admiration and of gratitude. When Barbara was not engaged in soothing the fears or administering to the comfort of her suffering companions, she was to be found for the main part seated on a small pile of surplus sail-cloth in a sheltered portion of the vessel, with her old-fashioned big print German Bible either open on her lap or lying shut close by her side. Every now and again, when the wind was not too boisterous, she lifted up her clear, sweet voice in song, singing ever some strain either from Charles Wesley's new hymn book, or from the mellow Psalms of her German "Vaterland," and seldom failed to effect her kindly purpose, that of bringing song to hearts and lips too much used to sadness, and smiles to faces too familiar with tears.

On one such occasion, brave Barbara was in her customary seat; the wind had gone down and the sea was comparatively smooth after a smart episode of wind and wave. The sun had broken through a leaden sky and the face of the singer seemed to be especially illuminated by his welcome rays. Captain O'Connor, who, when he could, was always a willing and delighted listener, stood near waiting for the song that he felt was bound to come, and "Lucky Mike" to give him the new name received since his baptism in the river Shannon was half way up the mast, busy, or appearing to be so with rope and sail. Then up sprang the song-bird that nestled in Barbara's soul, and Martin Luther's stirring hymn filled the air:

When the sky is black and lowering,
When my path in life is drear,
Upward lift my steadfast glances,
'Mid the mists of trial here.

"Ay, but 'tis the fine voice ye hev, Mistress Heck," exclaimed the approving skipper, lifting his battered tarpaulin cap in unconscious courtesy, and nodding his honest head like a Chinese mandarin to give his sentence fitting emphasis, "and the sentiment av the song is aiven better than the music; and them that belave the truth av it are blest with a moighty fine charrm in durty weather; more betoken that the saycret is well known to them all the time."

"True for you, Captain," said Peter Rechel, whose impulsive soul had been greatly stirred by his sister's song; "its none but a heretic could misdoubt it."

"Arrah, thin," sung out suddenly a voice from the mid-mast, "sure Misther Paythor, its yerself must be the hayratic, entoirely. It was but yestreen that ye groaned like a fiddle wid a bad cauld, 'case the Colleen Bawn was sure to raich land—at the bottom av the say!"

This unexpected diversion, I need not say, came from "Lucky Mike," whose good-humored face and twinkling eyes were seen peering out from the shrouds above. It was received with quite a chorus of mirthful laughter, and had the best effect upon the spirits and behavior of those whose trust in Providence was orthodox enough in fine weather, but unequal to the strain of their late experiences. We will not chide them overmuch; there are numberless "Christian people" who are strong and even eloquent on the subject of a "gracious Providence" when "seas are smooth and skies are clear;" but there are comparatively few whose "faith in lively exercise" can "sing a hopeful sonnet" on a reeling deck and beneath a stormy sky.

The sturdy skipper, whose experiences in former voyages gave him intimation of possible troubles yet in store, took the opportunity of hinting a word of warning, with an exhortation to the effect that, true to their peculiar faith in God, the Methodist Palatines should "quit themselves like men."

"As for myself," said Captain O'Connor, "since the day that I was a bare-footed gossoon playing on the Shannon sands, I've been taught by the holy praists av the thrue church, savin' your presence, to say my prayers, attend mass, an' do my duty; an' Father Mahoney, God rest his sowl, insthructed me that thin the Holy Mary an' the saints would protect me; an' for that rayson," he continued, making the sign of the Cross devoutly as he spoke, "I hope to take the Colleen Bawn safely over the fog-banks of Newfoundland, playse God, an' bring her safe into the harbor of New York. If not," he said with a quiet smile, and crossing himself again with evident devotion,—"why thin—belay there, Jock!" he shouted to the man at the helm, "put her a point or two closer to the wind!" and turning away he hummed with true sailor abandon,

Weigh anchor, bear off to the harbor above,
Where dwells the great Captain of Mercy and Love.

The horizon of our little band of religionists was widened somewhat that day. Philip Embury, honest man, turning to his compatriots, said, "Well, papist, Captain O'Connor may be, and heretics we may be, but I, for one, am quite content to ride through Newfoundland fogs with such a skipper at the helm."

Mistress Barbara smiled to hear the broadly tolerant sentiment of her honored leader, and turning to her unfailing Book of reference, the German Bible, she read: "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but, in every nation, he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him."

"We know," said Barbara, as she read these words, "that we have clearer light, the light that hath shined upon us in the face of Jesus Christ; therefore are we bound to shine right full, fairly and brightly, even as the sun doth at noon-day; and that," she continued, raising her voice, so that all around might hear, "even when mists and dangers do becloud us; for the true Light in its fulness should excel the sun which even a cloud can hinder."

Herein Brave Barbara spake the truth wisely and well. If those who possess the truth of God, those who hold the the divine endowment, or who think they do, will but live it all the time, then would the truth win its widening way without let or hindrance; and the practical pulpits of the home, the market and the social round, would soon accomplish the work which, for more than a millennium, the "sacred desk" has failed to do. Then it would not long be needful to say, "Know ye the Lord, for all would know him, from the least unto the greatest."

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Catharine Goddard, New London, Ct, writes that Rev. Dr. Paton, missionary to the New Hebrides, whose autobiography we recently noticed, related his experiences lately in the First Congregational Church of that city.

N. Wade, Fairview, Ky. 1. Of what denomination is the Rev. B. Fay Mills? 2. Is he a native of this country?

1. Presbyterian. 2. Yes; he was born in New Jersey in 1857, his father being the Rev. Thomas A. Mills, D. D.

Max Weiss, Greenville, Ky. What is the meaning of the word "Ishi" in the song of Miss Van Name, recently mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? The first line "My heart is full of laughter," reminds me of the martyr in England who as he burned at the stake said, "What a merry supper I will have with my Lord to-night."

"Ishi" is Hebrew and signifies "my husband." It is a metaphorical name prescribed for himself by Jehovah, to be used by the Jewish Church and expresses fidelity and perfect trust.

B. Thomas, Newark, N. J. How is the Jewish race distributed at the present time?

There are, according to late estimates, probably 12,000,000 Jews, who are distributed about as follows: Asia (including Persia, Syria, Arabia, India and China), 500,000; Africa, 500,000; Russia (including Poland), 5,000,000; Austria, 2,000,000; America, 1,000,000; South American republics, 50,000; the balance being distributed in England, France, Italy, Spain, Holland, Belgium, Portugal, Turkey and Greece. There are probably 25,000 in Jerusalem, according to Rev. Selah Merrill, the American Consul.

Subscriber, Fisherville, Ont. 1. If God knew when man was created that he would sin against him, what is meant by his repenting as stated in Gen. 6: 6? 2. How do you account for the discrepancy between the two accounts of the suicide of Judas, Matt. 27: 5 and Acts 1: 18?

1. The sacred writers experienced a difficulty in embodying in words the conception of God. In many passages they ascribe human emotions to him in their endeavor to bring his character within human comprehension. The passage, doubtless, means no more, than that God took up the necessary work of punishment with regret. His nature being love, he could take no pleasure in the suffering of his creatures. 2. There is no discrepancy. Peter went more into detail than Matthew considered necessary. Probably the rope broke, or in some other way Judas was foiled in his intention to die by hanging.

Mr. T. J. Smith, Manhattan, Kan., referring to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Check-cashing Bureau and its influence in checking the saloon evil in many States, writes:

Kansas has both a Constitutional and Statutory Prohibitory Law. And while it is not enforced in all parts of our State, as well as we wish it to be, it is enforced as well as most criminal laws, and there are very few places in the State where intoxicants are sold openly. And Topeka has not had a saloon for years, except the brief time they ran under the Original Package decision. Even the enemies of Prohibition admit the law is a reasonable success in Topeka. In my town, where I superintend a Sunday School, we never saw a saloon, or at least have no recollection of ever seeing one. And we Prohibitionists think this is something to be proud of.

Frank Sherer, Binghamton, N. Y. 1. How is it that the soldiers in New York get their pensions on Feb. 4, while others get theirs in January and April? 2. Why cannot they go to a bank and get their checks cashed free?

1. Congress passed a law on March 3, 1891, that money should be disbursed for pensions, every month, somewhere, and the schedule of payment was arranged as follows: January, April, July and October, payments to be made at Buffalo, Concord, Chicago, Des Moines, Milwaukee and Pittsburg, Pa. February, May, August and November, Indianapolis, Knoxville, Louisville, Philadelphia and Topeka. March, June, September and December, Augusta, Me., Columbus, O., Boston, Detroit, San Francisco, and Washington, D. C. 2. Banks never cash a check for parties they don't know, lest the check should not belong to the person presenting it.

Albert Jacobson, Brooklyn, N. Y. Does the Bible anywhere prohibit dancing?

Not specifically, but it condemns frivolity, folly and wickedness in every form. There are various points of Christian behavior applicable to modern life for which no specific rule or authority can be found in the Bible, as social conditions have greatly changed. Modern vices and indulgences have sprung up and these must be dealt with by the Christian as his conscience and judgment dictate. Dancing, though not in itself necessarily sinful, is exceedingly apt to degenerate into sin. Had promiscuous dancing, as it exists in society today, been prevalent in Bible times (instead of the comparatively innocent amusement then known, and the ceremonial or religious dances), it would unquestionably have been a subject of denunciation as sweeping as that applied to any of the vices of that time. The purpose of the Scriptures is to give general principles for the new life and so leave us the great benefit of deciding for ourselves how to to apply them. In modern dancing the evil so far overbalances the good that it is indefensible and should not be sustained by Christians.

TONGA'S CHRISTIAN KING.

THE cable announces that King George Tubou, of the Tonga or Friendly Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean, is dead. Many years ago, this monarch became a convert to Christianity and he gave valuable aid and encouragement to the missionaries, the result being that a great majority of his people renounced their idols and embraced the Christian faith. He was a man of powerful build and of large stature, with snow-white hair and beard, and was considerably advanced beyond his people. He lived in a quaint palace on Tonga Island. The kingdom of Tongo lies nearly 1000 miles northeast of Auckland, and includes 140 islands, which are largely of coral formation.

The Rev. John Hunt, of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, one of the earliest missionaries to the Tongas, had great success in Gospel work there in 1839, and King George was one of the first converts under his teaching. Previous to the introduction of Christianity, those islands were the scene of frightful barbarities, the most revolting cruelties and systematic cannibalism being prevalent. On leaving the Tongas, Mr. Hunt entered on missionary work in the Fiji islands not far distant and there he spent the remainder of his consecrated life, literally dying in harness.

Fighting Fire

is something that anyone will do instinctively because every one recognizes that fire is dangerous. Could the same impression be made general as to colds, thousands of lives would be saved annually.

Most people determine whether a cold is dangerous by the result. If it disappears itself, "it was nothing," if they never recover from its effects, they know they had "a terrible cold."

Few people would leave a fire in their own house to burn itself out; yet a cold is always as dangerous as the fire which we fight on its first appearance. People in delicate health well understand the menace of a cold. It is all the more serious to them because they have no reserve of physical strength with which to put it out when once it has obtained entrance. Drs. Starkey & Palen's Compound Oxygen has saved the lives of thousands by curing colds. It is known the world over as a most wonderful cure in all chronic diseases, and if a person can lift an ox, he should certainly be able to lift a calf, but people thoughtlessly fail to avail themselves of its help to keep out and put out colds. Folks are growing wiser, however, and many keep Compound Oxygen always in the house, thus saving health and time and money.

"DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—I have a young friend who contracted a severe cold and had a fearful cough. I persuaded him to use the Compound Oxygen, of which I had nearly a half a Treatment, and he took nothing else. Before half of the Treatment was used he was sound and well.

Whenever my daughter takes cold in the head, your Compound Oxygen Treatment cures it at once.

MRS. S. F. JERNEGAN, Sandersville, Ga."

"DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—I am highly pleased with the Oxygen Treatment, and am satisfied that it has done more for me than any course of drugs I could have resorted to. I recommend it on every occasion. I think your Treatment should be in every family in the country. If they used it for nothing else but to break up colds, it would repay them many times the outlay.

MILTON L. VAN BUSKIRK, Savannah, Mo."

Hood's Cures

Miss Huntley.

The marvellous cure of Miss Lettie Huntley of Cortlandt, N. Y., has attracted widespread attention. She was nigh to death's door with hemorrhages caused by ulcers in the stomach. Could eat nothing. When the physician said there was no hope, her mother urged her to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. She reluctantly consented, and in a few days felt stronger, bloating subsided, appetite gradually returned, and in a month she could walk across the room. In six months she was as well as ever in her life, and has been in perfect health ever since. She says: "I know that

WHAT WOULD MY FATHER DO?

WHAT would my Father do,
Should he know
How my heavy cross is borne,
The pains of ceaseless toil,
The burning heartaches rife
And the slow
Sapping of my fevered life—
What would my Father do?

What would my Father do,
Should he hear
How I am oft' perplexed,
Treading life's thorn-lined path,
To do right and not sin
And oft fear
Lest I should not honor him—
What would my Father do?

What would my Father do,
Canst thou say,
Were he here on earth with me
And saw and heard and knew
The tumult of my heart,
Day by day,
Pierced anew by poisoned dart—
What would my Father do?

Thy Father, troubled heart,
Knoweth all:
Knew thy care and sent his Son,
That, seeing him, thou might'st
See thy Father, who e'en heeds
The sparrow's fall.
Doth he not help thee in thy need?
This doeth the Father now.

Religion of the Ainu.*

THE Ainu have no temples, meeting-houses or chapels in which to meet for public worship, or shrines to hold their gods. Their inao (or sacred offerings) are pieces of whittled wood, having the shavings attached to the top. These are symbols or signs presented to the distant gods. By distant gods they mean the chief gods, or those who are remote from human beings, in contradistinction to the minor deities, or those near at hand. For, be it understood, the greater and higher and more honorable the god, the further off is his dwelling, and the more in number are the lesser and intermediary gods through whom he acts. We thus find the Ainu idea of the government of the world and men to be fashioned after the model of human governments with their kings and officers.

A dualism or struggle between two principles, a principle of good and a principle of evil, is said to be incessantly raging. The good and the evil are ever antagonistic the one to the other; they always have been and always will be. Thus, as there are two gods of the sea, one good and the other evil, so there are good and evil gods who are supposed to preside over the rivers. The river deities are called Wakka-ush kamui, "watery gods." They are feminine, and it is their province to watch over all springs, ponds, lakes, streams, waterfalls, and rivers. There is one particular goddess who has to watch the mouths of rivers and allow the fish, particularly the spring and autumn salmon, to go in and out. Her name is Chiwash ekot mat, which means "the female possessor of the places where the fresh and salt waters mingle." It is to this goddess that nusa are set up upon the banks near the mouths of rivers.

There are other gods who are supposed to have their home in the rivers; and they go by the general name of Pet-ru-ush mat, "the females of the waterways." They are supposed to have the oversight of all rivers and streams from their source to the sea. These deities, who are supposed to be good, are frequently worshipped. Thus, when the men go to fish in the rivers, they always ask the gods to make them successful; or, if they are descending rapids, they never forget to ask for guidance and protection, and they always remember to make offerings of inao and nusa.

But there is also the evil god of rivers, who goes by the name of Sarak kamui. Sarak is a word meaning accidental death, and Sarak kamui appears to be a god or demon who presides over accidents. Its evil deeds are not confined exclusively to the fresh waters, but are the cause of all land accidents. When an accidental death has taken place, either by drowning or otherwise, the Ainu, as soon as they find it out, proceed to perform a ceremony frequently called Sarak kamui. The ceremony is as follows: Sake is procured by the relatives of the victim, and messengers are sent to the different villages to invite the men and women to join in the proceedings. The men bring their swords or long knives, and the women their head-gear. On arriving at the appointed hut, the chiefs of the people assembled proceed to chant their dirges and worship the fire god. Then, after eating some cakes, made of pounded millet, and drinking a good proportion of sake, they all go out of doors in single file, the men leading. The men draw their swords or knives, and hold them, point upwards, in the right hand, close to the shoulder, and then altogether they take a step with the left foot, at the same time stretching forward to the full extent the right hand with the sword, and calling, as if with one voice, "Wooi!" Then the right foot is moved forward, the sword at the same time being drawn back, and the wooi repeated. This is continued till the place of accident is reached. The women follow the men, and with dishevelled hair, their head-gear hanging over the shoulders, they continue to weep and howl during the whole ceremony. Arrived at the place of accident, a continual howling is kept up for some time, and the men strike hither and thither with their swords, supposing that thus they are driving away the evil Sarak kamui. This finished, the people return to the house of the deceased. The ceremony of attending Sarak kamui is called Niwen horibi.

about economy and punctuality are useless without a practical application. You waste precious minutes with an uncertain watch; and if it is a costly one, there's the expense of risking it every day. The need is for an accurate, low-priced watch that has all the improvements and plenty of "style,"—the new quick-winding Waterbury covers these points. Both ladies' and gentlemen's styles, and a style for boys. It is stem-winding and setting; and has a jeweled movement cased in filled gold (14-karat), coin-silver, etc. $4 to $15.

Just a little Gumption,

in the matter of washing, will lead you to use Pearline. Look about you, and see the work of your friends who use it. Isn't the work easier? Isn't it better done? Can't you see that it must be easier and better without all that rubbing that tires out women and wears out clothes? Gumption is the seeing why and the knowing how. You can't know how to wash with the least work and the most saving, unless you use Pearline.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 370 JAMES PYLE, New York.

"THE DOOR OF HOPE."

A Rescue Mission in New York that has been Greatly Blessed—Girls Plucked like Brands from the Burning—Lifting Up the Fallen and Kindling Hope Anew in Joyless Hearts.

A FEW months ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published the touching story of "Bluebird," the girl who had been saved from a life of sin in the slums of New York, through the instrumentality of a godly woman, and transformed into a messenger of the Gospel to many others. That simple story reached the hearts of many of our readers who are deeply interested in mission work of this character. Letters recalling the bright close of "Bluebird's" short missionary career, and expressing kindly sympathy for the unfortunate class of which she was once a member, have been received from many quarters. "The Door of Hope" is a home established with a view to the rescuing of girls who have turned aside from the path of purity. Suitable places are provided for the girls, some being employed in the Home itself, and others engaged elsewhere. Every girl, on entering the Home is expected to do whatever work may be requisite, and daily three hours are devoted to sewing and other duties. The proceeds from this labor go direct to the support of foreign missions, as no money received from such work is retained for the support of "The Door of Hope." Mrs. E. M. Whittemore is the Founder and Superintendent of the Home, and Miss Anderson is the Matron. Both are noble Christian women, consecrated to the work they have undertaken and which has already been richly blessed under their charge.

MRS. E. M. WHITTEMORE, the Founder.

Like the Spurgeon and Muller Orphanages in England, and the institutions established by the late Dr. Cullis in this country, "The Door of Hope" has no endowment and no regular sources of support. It is carried on by faith alone. Many times it has been in financial extremity, but the Lord has never yet failed to supply all its needs. In his love he has moved the hearts of Christian friends in different parts of the country to contribute voluntarily in the past sufficient funds for carrying on the work, and Mrs. Whittemore trusts him also for the future, feeling positive of divine guidance in the whole work since its inception.

A "Morphine Fiend" Rescued.

Pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD might be filled with instances of the good work done under God's blessing by this unassuming Rescue Mission, and its kind-hearted Christian Superintendent. One very attractive young girl entered "The Door of Hope," shortly after it was opened. Though her countenance denoted refinement and culture, her heart was scarred with sin, and from the unnatural glitter of the eyes one could perceive the nature of the principal trouble; not drink, but the deadly morphine and chloral habit. She was in a desperate state when she came to the Home. She stayed there only a few days, and, after a display of temper, left suddenly. To the matron at the McAuley Mission she confessed that she was Resolved upon Suicide.

Mrs. Whittemore sought her out and tenderly brought her back to the Home, where she talked to her comfortingly about her troubles, and held out to her the pardoning love of Christ. She surrendered a loaded pistol with which she had intended to destroy herself. For three weeks, the sufferings of the unfortunate girl were intense, her entire system being saturated with the morphine poison; but she rallied again, and, in full surrender of heart, was soon comparatively well and a "new creature" in Jesus. Before many months had passed she found a position of trust, which she has held ever since.

How the Work Began.

Mrs. Whittemore tells, very interestingly, how she came to enter upon this work:

MISS ANDERSON, the Matron.

"God put into my heart to open a house some day for a select class of fallen girls, such as could only be rescued in the most private manner possible. From the first, I felt impressed, after waiting upon the Lord most prayerfully, that no contribution towards either sustaining or opening such a Home were to be solicited, and that it would be pleasing to him, to literally fulfil Phil. 4:19, in answer to Mark 11; 24, for this special work. Shortly after this a most generous amount of many hundred dollars was put at my disposal for just such an enterprise, but I was at once withheld from accepting it, by being informed that personally the one offering it could not conscientiously consent to such a method of support after the Home was opened. It was nevertheless a great temptation to push energetically ahead, and I became a good deal perplexed, when finally I

RELIGION AT HOME.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage. Text, Joshua 24: 15, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

ABSURD, Joshua! You will have no time for family religion; you are a military character, and your time will be taken up with affairs connected with the army; you are a statesman, and your time will be taken up with public affairs; you are the Washington, the Wellington, the McMahon of the Israelitish host, you will have a great many questions to settle, you will have no time for religion. But Joshua, with the same voice with which he commanded the sun and moon to halt and stack arms of light on the parade-ground of the heavens, says, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Before we adopt the resolution of this old soldier, we want to be certain it is a wise resolution. If religion is going to put my piano out of tune, and clog the feet of the children racing through the hall, and sour the bread, and put crape on the door-bell, I do not want it in my house. I once gave six dollars to hear Jenny Lind warble. I have never given a cent to hear anyone groan. Will this religion spoken of in my text do anything for the dining-hall, for the nursery, for the parlor, for the sleeping apartment?

It is a great deal easier to invite a disagreeable guest than to get rid of him. If you do not want religion you had better not ask it to come, for after coming it may stay a great while. Isaac Watts went to visit Sir Thomas and Lady Abney at their place in Theobald, and was to stay a week, and stayed thirty-five years; and if religion once gets into your household the probability is it will stay there forever.

Now the question I want to discuss is: What will religion do for the household? Question the first. What did it do for your father's house, if you were brought up in a Christian home?

That whole scene has vanished, but it comes back to-day. The hour for morning prayers came. You were invited in. Somewhat fidgety, you sat and listened. Your father made no pretention to rhetorical reading, and he just went through the chapter in a plain, straightforward way. Then you all knelt. It was about the same prayer morning by morning and night by night, for he had the same sins to ask pardon for, and he had the same blessings for which to be grateful day after day and year after year. The prayer was longer than you would like to have had it, for the game at ball was waiting, or the skates were lying under the shed, or the school-books needed one or two more looking at the lessons. Your parents, somewhat rheumatic and stiffened with age, found difficulties from their kneeling. The chair at which they knelt is gone, the Bible out of which they read has perhaps fallen to pieces, the parents are gone, the children scattered north, east, south, and west; but that [illegible] exercise in your father's house debasing or elevating? Is it not among the most [illegible] reminiscences? You were not as [illegible] as some of the older members of [illegible] ing with you at the time, and you did not bow your head as closely as they did, and you looked around and you saw just the posture your father and mother assumed while they were kneeling on the floor. The whole scene is so photographed on your memory that if you were an artist, you could draw it now just as they knelt. For how much would you have that scene obliterated from your memory? It all comes back to-day, and you are in the homestead again. Father is there, mother is there, all of you children are there. It is the same old prayer, opening with the same petition, closing with the same thanksgiving. The family prayers of 1840, 1850 as fresh in your memory as though they were uttered yesterday. The tear that starts from your eye melts all that scene. Gone, is it? Why, many a time it has held you steady in the struggles of life. You once started for a place, and that memory jerked you back, and you could not enter.

The broken prayer of your father has had more effect upon you than all you ever read in Shakespeare, and Milton, and Tennyson, and Dante. You have gone over mountains and across seas. You never for a moment got out of sight of that domestic altar. O my friends! is it your opinion this morning that the ten or fifteen minutes subtracted from each day for family devotion was an economy, or a waste of time, in your father's household? I think some of us are coming to the conclusion that the religion which was in our father's house would be a very appropriate religion for our homes. If family prayers did not damage that household there is no probability that they will damage our household.

"Is God dead?" said a child to her father. "No," he replied; "why do you ask that?" "Well," she said, "when mother was living we used to have prayers, but since her death we haven't had family prayers, and I didn't know but that God was dead, too!" A family that is launched in the morning with family prayers is well launched. Breakfast over, the family scatter, some to school, some to household duties, some to business. During the day there will be a thousand perils abroad—perils of the street car, of the scaffolding, of the ungoverned horse, of the misstep, of the aroused temper, of multitudinous temptations to do wrong. Somewhere between seven o'clock in the morning and ten o'clock at night there may be a moment when you will be in urgent need of God. Beside that, family prayers will be a secular advantage. A father went into the war to serve his country. His children stayed and cultivated the farm. His wife prayed. One of the sons said afterward, "Father is fighting, and we are digging, and mother is praying." "Ah!" said some one, "praying and digging and fighting will bring us out of our national troubles." We may pray in the morning, "Give me this day our daily bread," and sit down in idleness and starve to death; but prayer and hard work will give a livelihood to any family. Family religion pays for both worlds. Let us have an altar in each one of our households. You may not be able to formulate a prayer. Then there are Philip Henry's prayers, and there are McDuff's prayers, and there are Philip Doddridge's prayers, and there are the Episcopal Church prayers, and there are scores of books with supplications just suited to the domestic circle.

"Oh!" says some man, "I don't feel competent to lead my household in prayer." Well, I do not know that it is your duty to lead. I think perhaps it is sometimes better for the mother of the household to lead. She knows better the wants of the houshold. She can read the Scriptures with a more tender enunciation. She knews more of God. I will put it plainly, and say she prays better. Oh! these mothers decide almost everything. Nero's mother was a murderess. Lord Byron's mother was haughty and impious. You might have guessed that from their children. Walter Scott's mother was fond of poetry. Washington's mother was patriotic. Samuel Budget's mother was a thorough Christian. St. Bernard's mother was noble-minded. So you might have guessed from their children. Good men always have good mothers. There may, once in ten or twenty years be an exception to the rule; but it is only an exception. Benjamin West's mother kissed him after she had seen his first wonderful sketch with the pencil. Benjamin West afterward said, "That kiss made me a painter."

A young man received a furlough to return from the army to his father's house. Afterward he took the furlough back to the officer, saying, "I would like to postpone my visit for two weeks." At the end of the two weeks he came and got the furlough. He was asked why he waited. "Well," he replied, "when I left home I told my mother I would be a Christian in the army, and I was resolved not to go home until I could answer her first question." Oh the almost omnipotent power of the mother! But if both the father and the mother be right, then the children are almost sure to be right. The young people may make a wide curve from the straight path, but they are almost sure to come back to the right road. It may not be until the death of one of the parents. How often it is that we hear some one say, "Oh! he was a wild young man, but since his father's death he has been different!" The fact is that the father's coffin, or the mother's coffin, is often the altar of repentance for the child. Oh! that was a stupendous day, the day of father's burial. It was not the officiating clergyman who made the chief impression, nor the sympathizing mourners: it was the father asleep in the casket. The hands that had toiled for that household so long, folded. The brain cooled off after twenty or forty years of anxiety about how to put that family in right position. The lips closed after so many years of good advice. There are more tears falling in mother's grave than in father's grave; but over the father's tomb I think there is a kind of awe. It is at that marble pillar many a young man has been revolutionized.

O young man with cheek flushed with dissipation! how long is it since you have been out to your father's grave? Will you not go this week? Perhaps the storms of the last few days may have bent the headstone until it leans far over. You had better go out and see whether the lettering has been defaced. You had better go out and see whether the gate of the lot is closed. You had better go and see if you cannot find a sermon in the springing grass. O young man! go out this week and see your father's grave. Religion did so much for our Christian ancestry, are we not ready this morning to be willing to receive it into our own households? If we do receive it, let it come through the front door, not through the back door. In other words, do not let us smuggle it in. There are a great many families who want to be religious, but they do not want anybody outside to know it. They would be mortified to death if you caught them at family prayers. They would not sing in the worship for fear their neighbors would hear them. They do not have prayers when they have company!

They do not know much about the nobility of the Western trapper. A traveler going along was overtaken by night and a storm, and he entered a cabin. There were firearms hung up around the cabin. He was alarmed. He had a large amount of money with him, but he did not dare to venture out into the night in the storm. He did not like the looks of the household. After a while the father, the Western trapper, came in, gun on shoulder, and when the traveler looked at him he was still more affrighted. After a while the family were whispering together in one corner of the room, and the traveler thought to himself, "Oh! now my time has come; I wish I was out in the storm and in the night rather than here." But the swarthy man came up to him and said: "Sir, we are a rough people; we get our living by hunting, and we are very tired when the night comes; but before going to bed we always have a habit of reading a little out of the Bible and having prayers, and I think we will have our usual custom to-night; and if you don't believe in that kind of thing, if you will just step outside the door for a little while, I will be much obliged to you."

Oh! there are many Christian parents who have not half the courage of that Western trapper. They do not want their religion projecting too conspicuously. They would like to have it near by so as to call on it in case of a funeral; but as to having it dominant in the household from the first of January, seven o'clock A. M., to the thirty-first of December, ten o'clock P. M., they do not want it. They would rather die, and have their families perish with them than to cry out in the bold words of the soldier in my text: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

There was, in my ancestral line, an incident so strangely impressive that it seems more like romance than reality. It has sometimes been so inaccurately put forth that I now give you the true incident. My grandfather and grandmother, living at Somerville, New Jersey, went to Baskingridge to witness a revival under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Finley. They came home so impressed with what they had seen, that they resolved on the salvation of their children.

The young people of the house were to go off for an evening party, and my grandmother said:

"Now, when you are all ready for the party, come to my room, for I have something very important to tell you." All ready for departure, they came to her room, and she said to them: "Now, I want you to remember, while you are away this evening, that I am all the time in this room praying for your salvation, and I shall not cease praying until you get back." The young people went to the party, but amid the loudest hilarities of the night they could not forget that their mother was praying for them. The evening passed, and the night passed.

The next day my grandparents heard an outcry in an adjoining room, and they went in and found their daughter imploring the salvation of the Gospel. The daughter told them that her brothers were at the barn and at the wagon house under powerful conviction of sin. They went to the barn. They found my uncle Jehiah, who afterwards became a minister of the Gospel, crying to God for mercy. They went to the wagon-house. They found their son David, who afterwards became my father, imploring God's pardon and mercy. Before a great while the whole family were saved, and David went and told the story to a young woman to whom he was affianced, who, as a result of the story, became a Christian, and from her own lips—my mother's—I have received the incident.

The story of that converted household ran through all the neighborhood, from family to family, until the whole region was whelmed with religious awakening, and at the next communion in the village church at Somerville, over two hundred souls stood up to profess the faith of the Gospel. My mother, carrying the memory of this scene from early womanhood into farther life, in after years was resolved upon the salvation of her children, and for many years every week she met three other Christian mothers to pray for the salvation of their families. I think that all the members of those families were saved—myself, the youngest and the last.

There were twelve of us children. I trace the whole line of mercy back to that hour when my Christian grandmother sat in her room imploring the blessing of God upon her children. Nine of her descendants became preachers of the Gospel. Many of her descendants are in heaven, many of them still in the Christian conflict. Did it pay for her to spend the whole evening in prayer for her household? Ask her before the throne of God, surrounded by her children. In the presence of the Christian Church to-day, I make this record of ancestral piety. Oh! there is a beauty, and a tenderness, and a sublimity in family religion.

There are but four or five pictures in the old family Bible that I inherited, but Dore never illustrated a Bible as that book is illustrated to my eyes. Through it I can see into marriages and burials, joys and sorrows, meetings and partings, Thanksgiving days and Christmas festivals, cradles and death-beds. Old, old book! speak out and tell of the sorrows comforted, and of the dying hours irradiated. Old, old book! the hands that held thee are ashes, the eyes that perused thee are closed. What a pillow thou wouldst make for a dying head! I salute all the memories of the past when I press it to my heart, and when I press it to my lips.

Oh, that family Bible! The New Testament in small type is not worthy of being called by that name. Have a whole Bible in large type, with the family record of marriages and births and deaths. What if the curious should turn over the leaves to see how old you are? You are younger now than you will ever be again. The curious will find out from those with whom you have played in your childhood how old you are. Have a family Bible. It will go down from generation to generation, full of holy memories. A hundred years after you are dead, it will be a benediction to those who come after you. Other books, worn out, or fallen apart, will be flung to the garret or the cellar; but this will be inviolate, and it will be your protest for centuries against iniquity, and in behalf of righteousness.

Oh! when we see what family religion did for our father's household, do we not want it to come into the dining-room to break the bread, into the nursery to bless the young, into the parlor to purify the socialities, into the library to control the reading, into the bedroom to hallow the slumber, into the hall to watch our going out and our coming in? Aye, there are hundreds of voices in this house ready to cry out, "Yes! Yes! As for me and my house we will serve the Lord."

There are two arms to this subject. The one arm puts its hand on all parents. It says to them: "Don't interfere with your children's welfare, don't interfere with their eternal happiness, don't you by anything you do, put out your foot and trip them into ruin. Start them under the shelter, the insurance, the everlasting help of Christian parentage. Catechisms will not save them, though catechisms are good. The rod will not save them, though the rod may be necessary. Lessons of virtue will not save them, though they are very important. Becoming a through and through, up and down, out and out Christian yourself will make them Christians."

The other arm of this subject puts its hand upon those who had a pious bringing up, but who as yet have disappointed the expectations excited in regard to them. I said that children brought up in Christian households, though they might make a wide curve, were very apt to come back to the straight path. Have you not been curving out long enough? and is it not most time for you to begin to curve in?

"Oh," you say, "they were too rigid." Well now, my brother, I think you have a pretty good character considering what you say your parents were. Do not boast too much about the style in which your parents brought you up. Might it not be possible that you would be an exception to the general rule laid down, and that you might spend your eternity in a different world from that in which your parents are spending theirs?

I feel anxious about you; you feel anxious about yourself. Oh! cross over into the right path. If your parents prayed for you twice a day, each of them twice a day for twenty years, that would make 29,000 prayers for you. Think of them!

By the memory of the cradle in which your childhood was rocked with the foot that long ago ceased to move, by the crib in which your own children slumber night by night under God's protecting care, by the two graves in which sleep those two old hearts that beat with love so long for your welfare, and by the two graves in which you, now the living father and mother, will find your last repose, I urge you to the discharge of your duty.

Though parents may in covenant be,
And have their heaven in view;
They are not happy till they see
Their children happy too.

Oh! you departed Christian ancestry, fathers and mothers in glory, bend from the skies to-day, and give new emphasis to what you told us on earth with many tears and anxieties. Keep a place for us by your blissful side, for to-day, in the presence of earth and heaven and hell, and by the help of the Cross, and amid overwhelming and gracious memories, we resolve, each one for himself, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

asked the Lord, if it was really to be a work of faith, to send me some money. Before twenty-four hours were over, one hundred dollars was received from a friend (who knew nothing of these circumstances), with a written request that, as God had prompted her to send it for the object most upon my heart, I must not refuse to accept it. My faith was not only strengthened by this, and other smaller sums, which shortly followed, but I felt satisfied that the first impressions received were correct."

The commodious house No. 102 East Sixty-first Street was secured for the purposes of the Home and "the Door of Hope" was chosen as a name eminently suited to the work to be undertaken. Miss Anderson, a devoted Christian lady of Boston, was selected as Matron. Among the first offerings was one of furniture from a girl who had been turned from sin to Christ through the instrumentality of Mrs. Whittemore and several friends who had labored and prayed with her for months. Friends arose in unexpected quarters, and unsought gifts came which soon enabled the enterprise to progress satisfactorily. Some of these offerings came from far distant cities.

The "Door" Opened.

The good work of rescue has been going on unceasingly ever since the opening of "The Door of Hope." Young women from many different walks in life and whose childhood was passed amid a variety of social surroundings but who have fallen under temptation, find there a hand ready to lift them up and welcome them back to the paths of purity and peace. Mrs. Whittemore tells of many interesting cases that have occurred within her own experience where kindness and love have won back girls from their unhappy life when all other means have failed. Some of these have come from gilded dens of vice and others from the foulest haunts of sin within the boundaries of the metropolis. They have come to the "Door" dressed in the finery of their shame, and with their gaudy jewelry, yet with tears of repentance trickling down their haggard faces; still others have come almost in rags, with their poor bodies bruised and broken, and with discolored faces, swollen almost beyond human semblance by disease. The world would turn with loathing from such creatures; yet "The Door of Hope" welcomes them gladly, soothes and comforts them and leads them very gently to repentance.

One of these girls who after her conversion became an active worker for Christ, in addressing the convicts at Auburn Prison, gave the following graphic description of a life of sin:

A Saved Girl's Story.

"It isn't the pleasantest thing in my life to stand up here and tell you that I myself have been the same way," she said, "but when I was low down, and cast out by everyone, so that I did not care what I did, but kept drifting and drifting, until I started on a run down hill, shunned by even my own people, thinking there was no use to do better, then I found I could lead a better life. Everyone of you can do the same, if you will only trust in God.

"I tell you friends when we first start to serve the devil it may be in diamonds, but it soon comes down to glass. It may be gold, but it soon comes down to coppers. It may be silks but we will soon find ourselves in rags. I tell you, friends, I served the devil faithfully for many years. He sent me to prison, time after time, sent me to the hospitals, with pain and suffering; still it never brought me to my senses. It wasn't long prayer; it wasn't any long nagging, but it was the power of God."

The Door of Hope" is generally crowded. It is not a prison-house or reformatory institution in the sense of restraint upon the liberty of the inmates, for there are neither bolts nor bars. They are restrained by the Divine love alone:

Door of Hope for souls returning,
Hasten now His words to claim,
Jesus over lost ones yearning,
Bids thee enter in his name.

Every encouragement is offered to the inmates, not only to reform and lead honest and useful lives, but to accept the free gift of pardon and salvation through Jesus, and there have already been a number of remarkable conversions. Some are themselves now active in rescuing those with whom they formerly associated in sin. Others have been restored "clothed and their right mind" to the bosom of their own families; and still others are earnestly seeking the peace and happiness that come to Those Who Sincerely Repent.

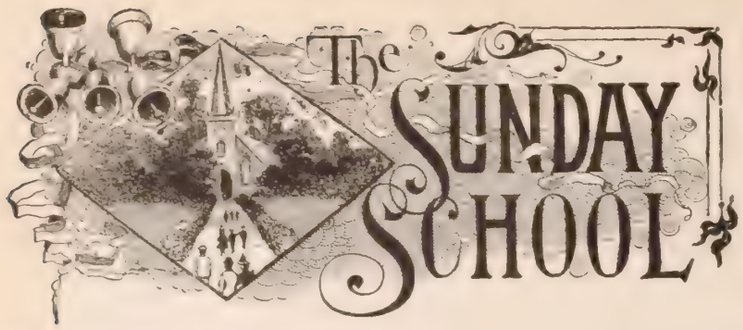
Mrs. Whittemore believes in the virtue of industry and its influence in driving out morbid and evil thoughts. All the girls are required to work, and a large variety of house-cloths, towels and aprons, may be seen in the "Missionary Closet" of the Reception-room. This is a labor of love by the inmates. In less than a year $150 was obtained in this manner. In the near future one of the rescued girls intends to go forth to distant lands for Christ, and the others are looking forward to sustain her in this way.

No fee for board or shelter is ever exacted from any inmate at "The Door of Hope." The only condition of admission is willingness on the part of the girl herself. Regular services are held, and every Thursday forenoon a public meeting for prayer, praise and testimony. The good already accomplished by this unassuming work is beyond estimate and its peculiar field is almost unlimited. The Home has recently been incorporated. Its whole history, thus far, is a triumph of faith. In two years and three months, Mrs. Whittemore has received over $29,000 in direct answer to prayer. The entire mortgage of $20,000 on the Home was cleared off by means of the money supplied through the channel of faith. At the outset, Mrs. Whittemore had $305 in all, with which to start the enterprise. This money her father had given her. The holder of the mortgage on the Home voluntarily reduced the amount to $19,000, thus contributing $1,000 to the work. No appeal has ever been made for the support of "The Door of Hope," its founder having the firmest confidence that all its wants will be supplied in the future, as in the past, by the exercise of faith in him whose work it is and who will not permit it to lack whatever is needful.



THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.*

S. S. Lesson for April 2. Matt. 28: 1-10. Golden Text, 1. Cor. 15: 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"NOW is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept." The son of the woman of Sarepta, the first dead body which was ever raised on earth, is not therefore the first fruits from the dead, for he had to die again. But Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." By the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, God hath begotten us again unto a living hope, the hope of being taken away without dying when Jesus comes, as by faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death, and was not found because God had translated him." The resurrection of Christ was permanent, his flesh could not see corruption, "it was not possible that he should be holden of" death; his resurrection was from death, as in the case of those whom he raised or who were raised before his life on earth. Death, which had conquered the first Adam, was conquered by the second Adam and he became in his own right, and by virtue of his own resurrection, "the Resurrection and the Life," the first fruits of them that sleep, the Guarantee of resurrection and the Guarantee of life to those whom he unites to himself as the branch to the vine.

A great earthquake ushered in Christ's resurrection. A grasp of the lifeless hand, a touch of the bier, a word of command, had sufficed him to call back others from the dead; but the earth itself must shake and tremble when her Lord arose. No hand of man was suffered to unseal and roll back the stone which the unbelieving and impious Jews had placed on the sepulchre: an angel from heaven must do it; the power of man over God's Christ was now at an end, and when the women came to the sepulchre on the morning after the Sabbath, they found life, not death there; an angel with a message from God, instead of the death of all their hopes; "Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified. He is not here; for he is risen as he said. Come see the place where the Lord lay."

The woman sought the place of death, Jesus, even Jesus crucified, was still to them more than all the world beside, and to them the resurrection message came. Death must precede Resurrection. "If we die with him we shall also live with him, if we suffer with him we shall also reign with him." Paul died daily, but always with the end before him: "to know him and the power of his resurrection. We are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even we also should walk in the newness of life," new in the power of his resurrection.

To the outward eye everything was lost in the death of Jesus. Who would believe in the miracles of him who could not deliver himself from his enemies? Who could accept the teachings of an executed Criminal? What was there left of the cause of this King of the Jews, when the very twelve who were his constant followers abandoned him, and nothing was left of what man would call his pretensions, but the mere title on the Cross given him in mockery? And yet this very death "abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel; it was death for resurrection. This very supposed Criminal, through death, destroyed him that had the power of death, even the devil, to deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage."

Many do not understand what a dying life, or a life of dying daily means; they therefore miss "the power of his resurrection." When Job said: "Till I die, I will not remove mine integrity from me. My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go; my heart shall not reproach me as long as I live." (Job 27: 5, 6) This was not dying daily; the tenacity with which he clung to his own righteousness showed how alive he was to his own reputation. But when Gehazi had so misrepresented Elisha to Naaman the Syrian as to make him believe, through his lie, that the prophet had repented of his disinterestedness in letting him go without taking any gift at his hand—Elisha, while dealing with Gehazi about his sin, makes not the slightest effort to set himself right with Naaman, and does not give vent to one word of wounded pride or self-pity; this was Dying to Self.

When Paul, who could, when it was necessary, recount such a list of trials and sufferings as he gives us in II. Cor. 11: 23-29, yet says of his life: "To me to live is Christ;" not persecution, famine, stripes, perils, imprisonments, etc., but Christ,—this was dying to self-consideration. When he could bear, in the present, even the preaching Christ of strife and contention, and, instead of worrying, rejoice, because God overruled; when he could look forward in the future to bonds and imprisonments, and say: "None of these things move me," that was dying to self-consideration. It is in the details of life that we are put to the proof, and it is in these things we learn what Paul longed for; —fellowship with his sufferings, and conformity to his death, if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead, ("out from among the dead," is the more literal translation.)

All men will rise from the dead, and therefore Paul could not mean that he could be an exception, but this expression, only this once used in the New Testament, indicates that there will be a selection from among the dead saints, as well as from the living ones, when Jesus comes, and "one shall be taken and the other left." In I. Thess. 4: 23-18, and I. Cor. 15: 50-54, it would seem as though there were but one coming of the Lord for his Church, but in comparing Matt. 24: 29-41 with verses 40, 42, we cannot but see that it is the latter description:

"One Taken

and the other left," for which we are told to "watch," not only daily, but every hour. And if we are right in supposing that Paul's longing was that from among the dead saints he should have part in that first company "out from among the dead," which shall meet together in the air with those out from among the living, who are counted "worthy to escape these things which shall come to pass," (Luke 21: 36), then we can understand how all his life was directed to this end. "One thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

But, say some, can the Church of Christ be divided, can part of a body be left on earth and part translated to heaven? How is it at the present moment? Will not the apostles of the Lamb, who are all gathered into the presence of their Lord, make part, and a very important part of the Bride? Yet they are in heaven, and others who may be members of the Bride are still on earth! In Rev. 12, there is a vision of a woman clothed with the sun, with heavenly light of the Sun of righteousness. Can this be other than the Church of Christ? After throes of anguish, she gives birth to a man child, literally a man son the fruit of the woman, the result of the Church's existence, the "people for his name." So it appears to us. Not a divided body, but the result and fruit of the body of Christ.

Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried (Dan. 12: 10); may it be that those who have not understood and accepted their vocation as crucified with Christ, and as living on earth in the spirit, and in the power of his resurrection, may be purified and made white and tried, and join that company who have come out of the great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, who shall be blest indeed, and yet it is not said that they shall Reign with Christ?

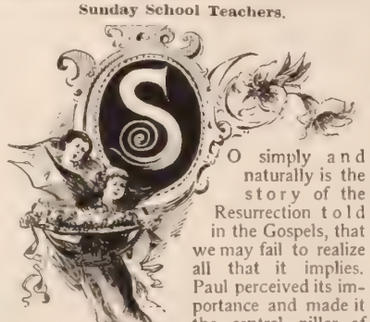
His Bride shall reign. The overcomers shall sit with Christ upon the throne; the living creatures are "in the midst of the throne;" and the four and twenty elders have crowns. And the servants who have part in the holy city which is called "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," "shall reign for ever and ever," but there are some who do not reign.

And our part, what is it? He is the Resurrection; but are we children of the resurrection (Luke 22: 36), because we are willing like the women at the sepulchre, to forego, and die to all which is life to the world and to self-gratification, honor, pleasure which ministers to our self-life,—and follow Jesus at any cost to ourselves, dying with him that we may live with him? He is waiting until his Bride has learned to follow him, waiting for a people for his name, whose life throughout eternity shall be the glorious fruit of his death, the witness to his resurrection. How long shall we keep him waiting?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.



SO simply and naturally is the story of the Resurrection told in the Gospels, that we may fail to realize all that it implies. Paul perceived its importance and made it the central pillar of Christianity. "If Christ be not risen," he wrote, "our preaching is vain." To him, all hung on that one fact. It is important, therefore, that teachers emphasize the evidence in support of it and leave no doubt in any child's mind as to the reality and veracity of the record. The time may come when the child will come in contact with doubters and he should be prepared to defend his belief. The fact is the most cogent evidence of Christ's divinity. There are other records in the Bible of resurrection from the dead, but in those was the intervention of a prophet, or of Christ himself. This is the one solitary instance of the dead rising spontaneously from the grave. He who so arose must be superior to death, as he overcame it.

Jesus was really dead. The Romans took care that there should be no doubt of that. He appeared dead, but that was not sufficient. The soldier thrust his spear into the side, piercing the vital parts. The fact that blood and water flowed out, showed that the sac in which the heart beats had been punctured. The body was removed from the Cross and placed in a new tomb, preventing the possibility of substitution. Its entrance was closed by a stone, probably in the shape of a millstone, which covered it, and this stone was sealed, so that no one should enter. In addition, a guard of soldiers was set in front of it. About thirty-six hours later, the women coming to the tomb with the spices, with which it was customary to anoint the bodies of the dead, find the soldiers prostrate and unconscious, the stone rolled away, and the tomb empty. Later Peter and John also go into the tomb and find it empty. John's observations were minute and he describes the appearance of the tomb and how the clothes in which the body had been wrapped were lying. Evidently the tomb was empty; and as the enemies of Christ had no motive for removing the body, but every motive for preventing it being removed; and the friends of Christ could not have removed it, protected as it was by the seal and by the Roman soldiers, there could be no explanation but the one that Jesus had risen from the dead. Then there is the evidence of the people who saw him alive. He was seen by John who had seen him pierced, and he recognized him. The women saw him and spoke with him. Thomas who, happily for future discussions, resolutely refused to believe in the resurrection, without ocular and tangible proof, was convinced; and as Paul tells us, five hundred people afterward saw him at the same time, many of whom were living at the time when Paul cited their witness. Beside this, Peter openly declared, within a few months of the event, that Christ had risen and this, not in some distant town where the statement could not be verified, but in Jerusalem itself, where the resurrection took place and before the Council who had abundant opportunity to disprove it, if it could have been disproved. No fact in history is so completely established by direct testimony of eye-witnesses. Only those who reject the credibility of the Gospels altogether can refuse to believe the fact of Christ's resurrection.

There was a great earthquake. The women must have felt it as they went to the tomb, but they were evidently not alarmed, for they went on; but they found the soldiers shaking and become like dead men. During an earthquake in Italy the inhabitants of a small village were very much scared. They were greatly surprised by the demeanor of a pious old lady, who, in the general consternation, was perfectly calm and unmoved. "Are you not afraid?" they asked her. "No," said she, "I rejoice to know that the God I serve can shake the world."

Rolled back the stone. The women had been worried about that stone. They could not think how they could get it rolled away but when they arrived it was already rolled away. It is often so with our difficulties. They look formidable at a distance but when we go boldly up to them trusting in God they disappear. A great preacher said that when in his early days he had to travel extensively in the West on horseback he used to have a great dread of the fords. He said, "Though I was courageous in most things I was afraid of those dark uncertain crossings. In going from place to place the thought of the fords I would have to cross was a perpetual terror to me. For instance, I would go through White River all right, and Blue River would be back of me; but there would be Eel River to cross. That was the worst of all—the one ahead is always the worst. At last I would come to it and I would brace myself up to go across; but instead of there being a raging foaming torrent such as I had anticipated the water would be so low that the horse would not be knee-deep in any place, and I would be mad because of all I had so needlessly suffered." There are many fords to cross in this life, but if we are wise in the things that make for our happiness we shall not worry about them till we come to them.

Fear not ye. A traveler relates that on a recent voyage a bird followed the ship so long that through sheer weariness it was obliged to alight. It was so worn out that it was easily caught. At first it was in terror, but one of the men who held it in his warm hands, was so gentle with it that the bird was quite content to stay there, and nestling its cold feet in its feathers, lay in the hands of the man, looking around with its bright eyes as if it felt perfectly safe. If it could have known when it was wearily following the ship how kind would be its reception, it would not have continued so long on the wing. Those who come to Christ always wish they had come earlier.

I know ye seek Jesus. A man entered the inquiry-room where Mr. Moody was talking with seekers, and said, "Mr. Moody, I wish you would tell me why I cannot find Christ." Mr. Moody replied, "Yes, I can tell you; you have not sought him with all your heart." The man said he thought he had. "Well," said Mr. Moody, "I think you haven't; because every one who seeks that way always finds him. Now I can tell you the day and the hour of your conversion; it will be when you seek Christ with all your heart, because the Scriptures assure us that none ever do that without finding him."

He is not here: he is risen. The world should see Christ in the life of his people. When anyone who has come to love Christ and be called a Christian becomes kind and gentle and forbearing and helpful then Christ has risen in that person's heart and life and the world can see in the change what he is. In some Roman Catholic churches are to be seen people kneeling before a carved image of the dead Christ, called a crucifix, and sometimes before relics of saints and bits of wood purporting to be fragments of the true cross. They need to hear a voice saying to them, Christ "is not here; he is risen. He is not now on the cross, he should be exhibited in your lives."

Go tell my brethren. Huber, the great naturalist, tells us that if a wasp discovers a deposit of honey or other food, he will not stay to devour it, but will return to his nest and impart the good news to his companions, who will sally forth in great numbers to partake of the fare which has been discovered for them. Christ's command is still in force to all who have tasted the good things he provides, "Go, tell my brethren."

A TEMPLE OF HELPFULNESS.

The New Home of the United Charities in New York—To be a Great Centre of Evangelical and Charitable Effort—Its Founders and Managers.

HOW to ameliorate the condition of the poor and elevate them from dependence to self-support, has become one of the leading sociological questions of the age. Various schemes, all more or, less impractical have been suggested, and the literature of the subject would make a formidable library. In the meantime, the situation has been steadily growing worse, and, as nearly all the advocates of amelioration entertain radical differences of opinion, very little of real value has yet been accomplished through social, political or other public channels.

JOHN S. KENNEDY.
(Who built and endowed the New Home)

About ten years ago, a number of philanthropic Christian gentlemen in New York began to give the subject a full and serious consideration and made personal investigation to ascertain the causes that had produced such widespread poverty and wretchedness as existed in that city, and which were to be found duplicated in every great centre of population. Even at that time, some very effective work was being done in the metropolis in the interest of the destitute poor.

About seven years ago, the Charity Organization Society proposed the plan of and the idea was very widely discussed, meeting with general approbation. Soon $150,000 was pledged for this purpose, the total amount necessary to carry out the Society's scheme being $250,000. In March, 1891, Mr. John S. Kennedy, who has for many years been interested in Christian and humanitarian work, offered to erect a building for the Society, and to endow it at his own expense. The site formerly occupied by St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, Fourth Ave. and Twenty-second St., was bought, and plans were prepared for a great temple of helpfulness which was completed early in the present year and the formal dedication of which took place recently.

Our illustration on this page shows the new home of the United Charities of New York. The total cost of the undertaking has been nearly $700,000. Mr. Kennedy presented the building to the four great benevolent organizations: the Charity Organization Society, New York City Mission and Tract Soctety, the Children's Aid Society, and the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor. Appropriate speeches explaining the gift were made by the president of each of these societies. The property is vested in a Board of Trustees representing all four organizations, Mr. Kennedy being president of the board, and his associates being R. W. DeForest and Hugh D. Anchincloss of the Charity Organization Society; Rev. A. F. Schauffler and Stephen Baker of the New York City Mission; J. Kennedy Tod and Charles L. Brace of the Children's Aid Society, and James A Scrymser and R. Fulton Cutting of the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor. Mr. J. Kennedy Tod was appointed treasurer of the Board, with Mr. Baker as secretary.

The new Home is the handsomest and most complete structure devoted to charity in the world. Its height is seven stories and the materials of which it is constructed are blue stone, terra-cotta, and St. Louis brick. The exterior is classical but plain, and it is unburdened with needless ornamentation, the object being rather to provide a commodious office building than an imposing edifice. It is fireproof throughout, and lighted electrically. In addition to named, it the headquarters of a number of educational, benevolent and philosophical organizations, including the New York Cooking School, the St. Andrew's Society, the Hospital Book and Newspaper Society, the Fresh Air and Convalescents' Home Society, the Orphan Asylum Society, the Society for the Prevention of Crime, and the Blue Anchor Society. Benevolent organizations can there find the advantages of a permanent headquarters at nominal cost. The income from all rentals goes to the four parent societies who are charged with the maintenance of the property. Nearly all the offices have already been rented.

Housed together, the charity organizations of the metropolis can now work more harmoniously and effectively than ever before. This event marks a new departure in charity work in New York, and a very important one. Thousands of wealthy citizens have taken a deep interest in the progress of the new movement, and it will undoubtedly be the means of re-enforcing very largely the resources heretofore placed at the disposal of the different societies for their work among the poor.

To Mr. Charles D. Kellogg, the General Secretary of the Charity Organization Society, belongs

The Credit of the Conception which has now been successfully carried into effect. Mr. Kellogg is a native of Troy, N. Y., and has been actively interested in organized charity since 1878, when he aided in the formation of the Society of Organized Charity in Philadelphia. When the need of a similar organization in New York became apparent, and the Charity Organization Society was formed, Mr. Kellogg became its General Secretary, and still holds that office. Sometime ago, the position of Superintendent of Charities of the District of Columbia was tendered to him by President Harrison, but was declined.

Mr. Kellogg's familiarity with the relief work among the poor has made him an authority on the subject. He has discovered many things that are exceedingly interesting to the philanthropic element in the community, one being that vicious and wilful pauperism increases in proportion to the relief provided. During a period in which the population of the country doubled, the census of the dependent classes increased five-fold. In large cities, the number of poor in five years increased 56 per cent. as against a 30 per cent. increase in population. This is the against indiscriminate charity, which has the tendency to encourage voluntary pauperism and to stimulate imposition. He found, also, that abundant and indiscriminate charity in a community created, among the poor, a sense of right to unearned support, destroying all desire for industry and thrift. Moreover, unorganized relief agencies were so multiplied that mischief, instead of good, was frequently the result of their well-meant actions. Imposture and vice thus found in charity an ally, to the detriment of the really deserving poor.

THE UNITED CHARITIES BUILDING, NEW YORK.

Under the present system of organized charity in New York, these abuses are very largely remedied, and with all the societies working together in the new building, the facilities for acquiring accurate information as to the condition and needs of applicants, as well as for affording prompt relief, will be vastly improved. The Charity Organization Society has affiliated with it ninety-one societies and institutions, over 150 churches and congregations, and upwards of 1,000 private families. The societies also work in co-operation with the Department of Charities and Correction. The entire city is mapped out in districts, each district being in charge of a committee. Any necessitous case reported is immediately investigated and relieved, and an effort is made to encourage the beneficiary to self-maintenance. The new bond of union will render the charitable efforts of the city and its Christian people more efficacious, and much good will doubtless be realized in behalf of the deserving poor.

"PAY THAT THOU OWEST."

THOUGHTLESSNESS of the needs of others is one fault of which a Christian should never be guilty. The consequences of it may involve terrible responsibility. A rich banker in a great city, a man who was noted for his large gifts to charities, and for his kindly disposition, was hurriedly asked one day to go to the succor of an unfortunate shoemaker who had attempted suicide. The appeal came from a starving family, whose wretchedness had goaded the father to the rash act. The banker went to the house indicated, and came face to face with a sad scene, of which to his startled surprise his own conduct turned out to be a cause. "It is not my husband's fault," said the weeping wife, "my husband is a hard-working, sober man. But we have been without food for days, for he could neither get work nor the money for that which he had done. To-day he went for the last time to collect a debt due by a rich family, but the gentleman was not at home. My husband was weak from fasting, and it ended—that way."

The banker hurried to his own house, opened his desk, and took out a file of bills that should have been punctually paid, but through sheer carelessness were not. Among them was an account made out by the poor cobbler he had just visited. It was the rich man's neglected debt that had nearly caused a fatal act. He resolved that never again should there be a day's delay in the payment of a debt, and begged God to avert the calamity that seemed impending. The prayer was answered. The man recovered, and the banker, grateful for his escape from the responsibility for his death, took care that he was never again in danger, through poverty, of committing suicide.

GOD'S CARE OF THE CHILDREN.

J. E. MCN., BARNUMSVILLE, Vt., writes: "I believe that no true and sincere Christian parent ever gave his or her child into the care of God, in proper manner, with requisite faith, and that child went astray and was lost. It is too sadly common for children of professing Christians to go to the bad, and infidels and unbelievers grasp all such cases with great avidity. But it is a delusion; it is an attempt of the Evil One to prove that either the arm of God is too short, or he forgets his promises to his children."

OUR POPULOUS GLOBE.

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD frequently write inquiring the numbers of the present population of the world. This inquiry and others having relation to the same subject are fully answered in a recent publication entitled Bevolkerung der Erde, which is translated and reviewed by Dr. Billings in the Chautauquan. According to Emile Levasseur, the French Academician, the total population of the earth in 1886 was 1,483,000,000. Over half of the people in the world live in Asia, and nearly one-fourth in China, which slightly exceeds the whole of Europe in population. India contains a little over one-fifth, and Africa

CHARLES D. KELLOGG.
(General Secretary, Charity Organization Society)

about one-ninth of the world's people. Less than one-fourth belong to what are ordinarily known as civilized nations, and of these nearly one-third, or about one-thirteenth of the total population of the world, belong to the English-speaking peoples.

In Europe there are more females than males—1,019 females to each 1,000 males; in the United States there are but 952 females to each 1,000 males. The difference in this case is mainly due to the fact that more males migrate than females. In almost all civilized countries the birth rate is diminishing. In 1660, Riccioli estimated the total population at 1,000,000,000; in 1810, Malte-Brun gave it as 640,000,000; in 1840, Bernoulli gave it as 764,000,000; in 1858, Dieterici estimated it as 1,270,000,000; and in 1868, Kolb gave it as 1,270,000,000. In 1872, Behm and Wagner estimated it at 1,377,000,000. In 1880, they reached 1,556,000,000. In 1882 they rejected the result of the so-called census of China in 1942, taking 350,000,000 instead of 405,000,000 as its population, which reduced the total result to 1,434,000,000, equivalent to 1,401,000,000 in 1880. In the figures of Wagner and Supan for 1891, a further reduction is made of 46,000,000, 38,000,000 being dropped from Africa alone. According to revised estimates, the population of the earth increased in eleven years from 1,355,000,000, to 1,480,000,000, giving an annual increase of 0.84 per cent. Taking into consideration the fact that excessive death rates prevail in semi-civilized and barbarous nations, it seems probable that the average annual increase by excess of births over deaths is certainly less than one per cent. of the population.

A PRAYER.

Written for "The Christian Herald"

SAVIOUR, abide with me:
Sweet are my thoughts of thee;
Help me from sin to flee—
Be thou my guide!
Dark are the ways of sin,
May I the victory win,
Oh, Saviour, take me in,
Safe to thy side!

Thou art the way of light,
Making the pathway bright
Up from the realms of night
Into fair day;
May I draw near to thee,
Let my thoughts ever be
Of sweet eternity,
Fadeless for aye!

And when my life is o'er,
To a more peaceful shore
Bid my freed spirit soar,
Into new day;
There with my God to be
Through all eternity;
Do thou abide with me,
Saviour, for aye! —ARTHUR LINDEN.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 2. John 11: 25; John 14: 19

PAUL'S desire that he might know the power of Christ's resurrection is shared by every Christian who has realized his true mission in the world. To have that power is to have everything that ennobles life and raises it spiritually above mere existence. It opens a new world to the vision, in which there is a limitless prospect of attainment, reaching up to the infinite. The disciples were awed by its presence when they saw it in Christ himself. At those meetings during the forty days between the resurrection and the ascension, there is perceptible, in the meagre records we have of them, an evident reverence and veneration not manifested in their previous intercourse with their Lord. He was clearly something more than they had thought him, even when he was working miracles. This mysterious life of his marked him out as a Being above any conception they had previously formed of him. The power, by which he had shaken off the chains of death and emerged from the tomb, had never before been seen in the world and the disciples perceived it in wondering bewilderment. What that power was they could not understand; but they were to be endowed with so much of it as their humanity could receive and it was to transform their lives. The resurrection was only a manifestation of God in Christ, and they had the promise that God would be in them by his Spirit. In them, tainted as they were, by the sins and the frailties of human nature, the power would be repressed and straitened, as it never had been in him, but its quality would be there and it rested with themselves how much of it they should have and wield. They seem to have been surprised at its effects when they tentatively exercised it after their Lord was parted from them; but as they used it, as they had seen Jesus use it, in the healing of the sick, their confidence grew and they were sure of its presence.

And this power, of which the resurrection was the astonishing manifestation, is still imparted to men. To know that power by personal experience is a boon for which all that the world treasures might well be sacrificed. All that would prevent its presence, or hinder its exercise, is a personal loss. As we have seen men of brilliant powers and commanding intellect become useless in the world, through their subjection to some degrading vice, so the Christian who has worldly desires and gives himself to worldly pleasures, nullifies the gift he possesses. It is only through purity of heart and life that the resurrection power can make itself felt. All that we comprise in the word "flesh" must perish before the power can dominate the life and have its proper influence. When that happens and the man is dead to the world, impervious to its temptations, unmoved by ambition, or avance, or lust, and full of love for men and eager to give himself for their welfare, then the power that is in him becomes mighty and the world recognizes the divine presence in him. Christ has risen in his heart and life and God gives not his Spirit by measure unto him. As we celebrate this day the resurrection of the Lord the desire of every heart should be that the power which produced it and which produced that life of exquisite loveliness, may reign there in its fulness and might.

TENTH ANNIVERSARY.

THE Y. P. S. C. E. of the Reformed Church of Belleville, N. J., celebrated its Tenth Anniversary recently. Although the weather was unfavorable, yet the audience was large. At 7.45 o'clock a service of song was held, followed by responsive reading of the 103rd Psalm. Mr. A New, President of the East Avenue Baptist Church of Long Island, then followed in prayer. Mr. Wm. Wylie, President of the Society, gave a cordial welcome to all the delegates and also spoke a few words concerning the past history of the Society. The Secretary, Miss Dora G. Black, read a report giving the synopsis of the history of the Society for the past ten years. The next item on the programme was an address by Rev. A De W. Mason, of Boonton, N. J., but a telegram was received stating that sickness prevented his being present.

Miss Caroline H. Brookfield, N.J. State Secretary of Bellvidere, N. J., was then introduced and she received an attentive hearing, her address was on "steadfastness in Christian Endeavor." She not only held the attention of the seniors, but every child in the audience was deeply interested. Rev. Wm. J. Leggett pastor of the church, then gave a stirring address; Dr. Leggett was followed by Mr. Arthur N. Clark, Corresponding Secretary of the Essex County C. E. Union. The proceedings were terminated by a Consecration Service under the able leadership of Mr. Halsey Hammond of Boonton, N. J. During the evening the choir sang two anthems and several well known Christian Endeavor hymns were sung in a spirited manner by the Congregation.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN VIRGINIA.

AT the recent State Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Virginia, an encouraging report of progress was presented. It appears that five new associations have been organized during the past year. Good work has been done in the college department; three deputation men had devoted their time to visitation among the colleges. Probably the largest advance has been in the railroad department. The several railroad companies in Virginia are contributing to the support of the work at nine points, the sum of $6,500 per year. At Clifton Forge the Chesapeake and Ohio Company has promised $7,000 toward a building for railroad men, and the citizens at this point have contributed in addition $3,500. This same company has promised $4,000 for a building at Gladstone for railroad men. The railroad association at Crewe has just completed a building costing $4,000. The independent association at Roanoke has been reorganized as a department. The secretary reported 237 visits to fifty-two points, and that in the prosecution of his work he had traveled 30,663 miles. New features adopted by the convention were: The holding of conference for college association presidents; that more attention be given to the encouragement and development of work among boys; that an additional man be employed by the State Committee during the coming year, if his services be required; and that special attention be given to corresponding members of the State Committee; $3,900 were raised on the floor of the convention for the work of the coming year.

THE ARMENIAN CIRCLE.

THE King's Daughters among our readers will be glad to hear something of a circle which meets in the old Bible town of Cesarea. It is extracted from a letter which Miss Carrie P. Fowle sends to the Silver Cross. She says: "Nine years ago, a number of young girls united together to form a Circle of workers for Christ, and took for themselves the name of 'Desteraz' or freely translated—'The Lend a Hand' Circle. They did not belong to any society, but were just a band of young women who desired by united effort to do some good. Though many of them were poor and unable to do great things, yet all tried to help as best they could, giving of their time to the making and selling of useful articles and fancy work, such as people in this land would buy, and thus striving to earn something for the Master's work. It has been a delight to me to watch the growth of these young Christians and see how God has blessed them.

"Their last effort was to start and maintain a Kindergarten. It was begun with fear and trembling, and many prayers, but God has richly blessed us, and given the school greater success than we ever dreamed of attaining. Everybody is delighted with the school. Parents come and sit for hours at a time, listening to the songs and stories and seeing the beautiful exercises of the little children. Their eyes are being opened. They begin to understand how to treat their children, so that, besides teaching these little ones, the school has become an object lesson to their parents, teaching them lessons of very great importance, and perhaps doing as much for them as for their children! Bright pictures—many of them Bible scenes—are hung about the walls of our school-rooms, and the little people are hearing of him who said, 'Suffer little children to come unto me.' They carry the 'old, old story' home to parents who listen with a new interest, as they hear it from the lips of their own little ones. Thus the 'bread' is being 'cast upon the waters,' and who can measure the good that it is doing for their children and their homes!

"My great object in writing is to ask if there are not some Circles of the King's Daughters or the King's Sons who would like to 'lend a hand' to us in this work for little children, in this ancient Cappadocian city! The work has grown too large for one small Circle to carry on alone. We do not wish to stop it, when so many good results are already visible, and yet we cannot go on without help." The needs of the Circle are for the salaries of the native teachers, three of whom are now employed at an aggregate cost of $210 a year.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE Convention of the Epworth League of the Genesee Conference at Rochester, N. Y., was a scene of memorable enthusiasm. Over eight hundred delegates attended and the Convention was continued for three days. The General Secretary was present and gave a stirring address. The number of Chapters in the Conference is now 215 with an aggregate membership of 18,014——The League of the city of Newark, N. J., has been holding its first annual convention. It elected Mr. B. F. Clark president for the year and Dr. George M. Whitfield, secretary.——At Columbia, Ind., the League has been doing good service in connection with a revival campaign. It took entire charge of the musical exercises, providing soloists as well as chorus. The pastor Rev. J. M. Driver is loud in his acknowledgments of the value of the service rendered by the League. ——The Broadway Chapter of Baltimore, Md., is one of the most important and useful departments of church work. It frequently takes charge of the Sunday evening service and does much of the visitation of the sick which usually falls upon the pastor. It is also active in philanthropic work.——The Chapter at Grand Ledge, Mich., has taken a thoughtful and useful step in arranging special meetings for the help of the young converts brought into the church during a recent revival.——In the young State of Washington, the League is prospering. Nearly every church has adopted it and at the recent Convention there were testimonies to its usefulness from all parts of the State. In revival work, especially, it has done good service bringing young people to the meetings and looking after the converts.

THE Y. W. C. A. OF N. Y.

FROM the annual report of the Young Women's Christian Association of New York which has just been issued, it appears that the membership is now 827. Of these 277 are active members, 370 associate, eighty-two life and 98 honorary. Much useful work has been done during the year of an educational as well as of a spiritual character. Unhappily it seems probable that its usefulness will be curtailed by a temporary lack of funds. In trying to bring the advantages of the Association within the reach of the self-supporting girls who need them most, the rate of subscription was fixed at a point below that necessary to meet expenses. It was hoped that philanthropic people would make up the deficiency by their contributions. That, however, has not been done, and the deficiency of last year is a debt which the Association does not know how to pay. Unless aid comes from wealthy ladies who know what excellent work the Association is doing, it will be necessary to discontinue some of the departments or to raise the rate of subscription. Either course would impair the usefulness of the institution, but the managers do not feel justified in incurring more debt. An urgent appeal for assistance has been issued to which, it is hoped, there will be a liberal response. The actual need of the Association is for about thirty-five thousand dollars. Wealthy ladies desiring to help their poorer sisters could not find a more efficient way of doing so than by relieving this institution of its load of debt.

A CHINESE C. E. SOCIETY.

IN the course of his tour around the world in the interest of Christian Endeavor, Dr. F. E. Clark received a warm reception at Shanghai, China. In describing it in a letter to the Golden Rule, he says: Our five pleasant, busy days in Shanghai gave us an insight into the work of this great missionary city. Here are centred stations of the Presbyterians, Southern Methodists, American Episcopalians, English Episcopalians, London Missionary Society, and the China Inland Mission. There are probably few places on missionary soil on the face of the earth where more missionaries are congregated; and in respect to quality it was a rare audience of intelligent and earnest Christian men and women that greeted me in the Union Church of Shanghai. At once a self-constituted committee of missionaries volunteered to translate and print sufficient literature of the movement for present needs, and Shanghai will doubtless become one of the centres of Christian Endeavor effort for all the East. The Illustrated Christian News, a monthly Chinese paper that has a large circulation among the native Christians, will devote much space to the Society.

One of the most pleasant meetings that I have attended in Shanghai was that of the Christian Endeavor Society connected with the American Presbyterian Mission Press. Connected with this large establishment, famous throughout all China, are many Christian Chinamen, who work as compositors and pressmen, as well as foremen of the several departments of the establishment. These, under the leadership of Dr. and Mrs. Fitch, whose son and daughte are well known to Christian Endeavorers in Wooster, O., have formed themselves into a vigorous and efficient Christian Endeavor Society. They hold their meetings every Thursday night, and it was my pleasure to attend one of these meetings, to see the earnest faces of these printer Endeavorers, and to hear of the good work that they are trying to do for the Master. So far as I am aware this is the first printers' Christian Endeavor Society in the world.

Famous American Homes.

Some of them Humble Enough, Others Palatial, but all have Sheltered Great Men.

HISTORY, the collective biography of nations, is doubtless the most attractive and instructive study in the world, and it is equally true that the most fascinating part of history is found in the individual record of those daring and progressive spirits who have been the principal actors in the events of the time in which they lived. Every detail concerning the careers of the men who left their impress upon the age is of interest, and this interest does not expire with their own death. Thus we find, even to-day, that the people of our Union are still keenly watchful and appreciative of any new fact that comes to the surface, relating to any or all of those, now passed away, who shone on the battlefield, in the legislature, or on the forum. The scene of their birth, however humble, the field of their early struggles and triumphs, and the quiet retreats where, after the heat of the battle, they sought seclusion and repose toward the end of life, are each regarded with an attention little short of veneration.

In the homes and birthplaces of famous Americans, which are depicted in the illustration on this page, there is a variety of surroundings sufficiently marked to indicate the difference in social station in almost every case. Thus the unpretentious rural birthplace of Webster, with its single row of windows and its old-fashioned door, and the equally rude birthplaces of Washington, Lincoln, and Garfield, with their air of comfort, industry and rigid economy, form a powerful contrast to the splendidly classic home of Mr. Jefferson at Monticello, and the no less picturesque later residence of Washington at Mount Vernon—the last in which he ever lived.

Investigation shows that a majority of the great men, of our own nation at least, came from the country, most of them very likely from homes quite as unassuming as those shown by the artist. The brain and stamina of all great cities are recruited from the country. It is natural, and perhaps inevitable, therefore, that when the energies of life have been expended and the battle is nearly done, they should turn again to the fields and hedges, the woods, streams and hills with a great longing to seek amid such surroundings the repose they can find nowhere else. It was this longing that led Adams and Jefferson to seek retirement near the close of their lives. Daniel Webster enjoyed the felicities of a quiet existence in his old age at Marshfield, Jackson at the Hermitage, and Henry Clay at Ashland. With riper knowledge, ampler means, and matured and educated minds, they sought to conjure up and revive the pleasures of their youth; and failing this, it was as though they had quite agreed with the poet who, imbued with the love of the country, thus sang of the delights of a rural existence during life's declining years:

> Happy the man, whose wish and care
> A few paternal acres bound,
> Content to breathe his native air
> On his own ground—
> Whose herds with milk, whose fields with bread
> Whose flocks supply him with attire,
> Whose trees in summer yield him shade,
> In winter—fire.

To a person of means and possessed of any degree of refinement in the modern sense, such primitive simplicity would not be tolerable. The home of Washington at Mount Vernon was a model of substantial comfort and even of elegance, while that of Jefferson at Monticello was adorned with rare works of art and costly furniture. He loved music, therefore he had a half dozen or more instruments, from a harpsichord to a flute; he delighted in books and antiques, hence he had acquired a valuable library, and much costly bric-a-brac.

From "Memorial Life of James G. Blaine." HOMES OF GREAT AMERICANS. Historical Publishing Co., Phila.

These homes, though some of them are yet in existence, will gradually pass away as will every vestige of their visible earthly possessions, but the splendid family and public influence of those distinguished men will remain for the encouragement of posterity. Simplicity, purity of purpose, absolute incorruptibility in public affairs, were their characteristics. It would be well indeed if the example were more generally followed in these days than it is.

Woman's Power.

"MEN not yet gray have seen the colleges opened to women, with nearly all the professions beyond those of school-marm, seamstress and saleslady," writes Frederic M. Bird. "Is it not rather too early to determine finally what are their meagre abilities and large limitations? Give them a chance to get used to to their new and partial enfranchisement, to practice their untried powers awhile, to throw off the long burden of contempt, disparagement, and repression; and then—perhaps within a century or two—they will show us what they can or can not do. I do not know that they will develop powers of ratiocination; of initiation, of practicality, of creation (if there be any such power vouchsafed to mortals), equal to those of men. Very likely not; but let us wait and see. Why mistake appearances or probabilities for certainties, and pretend to know what we don't know. All over the world, the present century has been marked by the advancement of women."

THE CITY OF GOD.

Written for The Christian Herald

PERFECT through suffering God's children shall be,
In the light of his Word their victory they see.
There's a robe and a crown at the end of the race
And a mansion prepared, which no storms can deface.

In that beautiful city of which we are told,
The walls are of jasper, the streets of pure gold;
The gates are of pearl, the foundation sure
And its glories forever and aye endure.

O City of God! O home of the blest!
Where earth's weary pilgrims shall find perfect rest,
May I with the prophets and martyrs of old
Forever in rapture thy glory behold!

THE MOTHER'S HOUR.

MY mother's habit was every day, immediately after breakfast, to withdraw for an hour to her own room, and to spend that hour in reading the Bible, in meditation and prayer, writes Canon Farrar. From that hour, as from a pure fountain, she drew the strength and sweetness which enabled her to fulfil all her duties, and to remain unruffled by all the worries and pettishnesses which are so often the intolerable trial of the narrow neighborhoods.

As I think of her life, and of all it had to bear, I see the absolute triumph of Christian grace in the lovely ideal of a Christian lady. I never saw her temper disturbed, I never heard her speak one word of anger, of calumny, or of idle gossip; I never observed in her any sign of a single sentiment unbecoming to a soul which had drunk of the river of the water of life, and which had fed upon the manna in the barren wilderness.

The world is the better for the passage of such souls across its surface. They may seem to be as much forgotten as the drops of rain which fall into the barren sea, but each drop adds to the volume of refreshful and purifying waters, "The healing of the world is in its nameless saints. A single star seems nothing, but a thousand scattered stars break up the night and make it beautiful."

Children at Church.

IN early years children accompanied their elders to church, writes Hon. E. Lyttelton in his book entitled Mothers and Sons. As early as possible get the boys to understand something of the history of our forms of worship, and keep on reminding them judiciously of what you have told them. How can you expect a fidgety boy of twelve to get much good from a service unless he knows why he is there, why certain prayers are used; and lastly, unless he feels that to subdue the inclination to incessant movement is part of his offering? I trust you will not fall into the error of supposing that by diminishing the obligation of praise and prayer you will guard a boy against the modern fashion of avoiding church services. If you accustom him to only one service on Sunday, how will he attend when he grows up? Teaching is what he requires. Something would be gained if boys were taught to regard sermons as not the most important part of the service. Strangely enough, people insist that if sermons were more attractive, young men would go to church in flocks. Perhaps they would, but what then? They would tolerate the worship and the supplications offered by others, in order to enjoy an eloquent or a pungent discourse, seasoned to suit their dainty palates. And no one is so fastidious about a sermon as a young gentleman who cannot abide being bored and who is restive under the average pulpit discourse.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

RAISING OF THE WIDOW'S SON.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Luke 7: 11-16.

THE subject of our meditation this morning is the raising from the dead by our divine Lord of the son of the widow of Nain. That we may better understand the facts as they are brought before us in the narrative, let us go back two days in the history of our Lord, before this miracle was performed. The sermon on the Mount had been uttered, and so great was the interest attaching to the words which were then spoken that large multitudes of people followed Jesus from the hillside to his dwelling place in Capernaum. His own familiar friends did not understand him. He was spending his nights in watching and in prayer; he was spending his days in teaching the people and in working miracles. They believed that he was not himself, and they made an effort to lay hands upon him; because, said they, "He is beside himself."

The Journey.

The day before this miracle was performed, Christ healed the centurion's son at Capernaum, he and his disciples and a multitude which had gathered about him, leave Capernaum and journey toward Nain, a distance of twenty-one miles, where this miracle took place. Their road lay along the hills of Galilee, passing the base of Mount Tabor; and now toward evening they descend to the plain of Esdraelon, that historic, that wonderful plain of Palestine.

Note, in passing, the fact that this miracle is recorded by Luke alone. The miracle of the raising of Lazarus from the dead is recorded by John alone. The miracle of the raising of the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue is recorded by Matthew, Mark and Luke. Luke, therefore, is the only one of the evangelists who records more than one raising from the dead. Matthew and Mark give the first, Luke gives it also, and in addition he gives this one, which is peculiar to himself. John stands apart, so far as the miracle of the raising of Lazarus is concerned. Now we are concerned simply with the narrative as it is found in the Gospel of Luke. He has brought out all the facts so clearly, and has given them so much of beauty and dignity, so much of grandeur and glory, that we cannot but study them with pleasure and with profit.

The Scene of the Miracle.

It is now toward evening, our Lord and his disciples are entering the plain of Esdraelon. The little village of Nain lay directly before them. It is four miles south-west of Tabor. It is twenty-one miles south-west of Capernaum. There is a small village on this very spot to-day; it contains some twenty houses, huts more strictly speaking; unadorned, rude Syrian huts. Dean Stanley has described his visit and the location of this place so vividly and minutely that we can almost see the place as we follow his narrative. It is situated picturesquely on a low mountain-spur of Little Hermon as it juts out into the plain. There is a natural monument, a fountain which stands close by, and the name which it bears even to this hour, marks it with sufficient distinctness. There is still to be seen the very spot where it is supposed, this miracle occurred. There was in all likelihood only one approach to the little town of Nain, that on the side sloping down toward the plain; and, doubtless, the funeral procession was coming out of the village, just as Christ with his disciples was coming in, and so the two processions met near the gates of the city. It was toward evening, for Christ and his disciples had come twenty-one miles during that day; and in all probability the sun was just setting behind the western hills, throwing the beams of his golden glory over this little town as the mournful procession was coming out of the gates.

The Tombs in the Cliffs.

You must bear in mind that the Jews, like the Greeks and the Romans, never buried their dead within their cities, except in the case of some distinguished persons, such as the Kings of the house of David, who were buried in the city of David. Sometimes one of the family of kings might be buried in a royal city, but, as a rule, the dead were never buried in the city. It is a great pity that in more modern times we have not more closely followed this worthy example. Nothing is more abhorrent, nor more unnecessary, and sometimes it may be said that nothing is more hurtful, than the burying of the dead in churches and chapels, as is so often done in the Old World, even to this day. The Greeks and the Romans knew better; the Jews knew better; and the son of this widow must be borne outside the walls of Nain to his tomb in the neighboring cliffs. A short distance east of the village remains of tombs hewn in the rocks are still seen.

Notice, in the first place, our Lord's tender compassion, as shown in this narrative. We have two processions; one of Christ and his disciples going toward the town; the other of the mourners going out from the town. They meet near the gates, and as they meet, Christ bids the procession stop. A glance reveals to him all the circumstances, and the sight which met his eyes filled his heart with pity. He had never seen that woman before, and, so far as we know, she had never before seen him. He had never been in Nain before; and, so far as our knowledge or information extends, Nain was an inconspicuous town. It is never mentioned in the Old Testament, and it is nowhere else mentioned in the New Testament. Christ in his former circuits in Galilee had not gone in the vicinity of Nain. This woman, therefore, was yet he knew her well. He needed not than any man should tell him what sorrow lay on her heart, for no one in all that procession of sympathizing villagers knew the secret sorrows of that woman's life as they were known to the Lord Jesus Christ.

With what a strange command he greets her. He said to her, "Weep not." I doubt not that she was startled when she heard his words. Who is this stranger who so speaks to me? Does he wish to mock my grief? Would he make light of my sorrow? And we may well conceive of her anxiously looking up through her tears into the benignant face of our Lord Jesus. It is to her the face of a stranger, yet the love of Christ's heart is seen in his face. But why should he give this command? He will soon remove all cause for weeping. May she not weep out her sorrow until the hour of her rejoicing shall come? No, although Christ knew what he was about to do, the sympathy of his heart would not permit him to remain silent. He must speak the word of comfort and of sympathy that she may not grieve so much. There was much in the case to excite the sympathy of one less compassionate than was Christ. This young man was her only son; and the original shows that he was not simply the only son she then had, but he was the only son that she ever had; that is the real meaning of the word here employed; the only son that she ever had, and she was a widow.

Here, then, is the picture painted with two strokes of the narrator's brush; and she stands before us overwhelmed by Her Twofold Sorrow.

This was not the first bier that she had followed to the grave. Perhaps it was not long since her husband had died. All her thoughts turned toward, and all her hopes rested upon this only son. But disease came, death soon followed; and now he was borne from her sight to his last resting-place. Alone in her grief she is a picture of the keenest sorrow, as she follows him to the grave. Dear friends, what a delight it is to think of Christ's pity, to observe the tokens of his tender compassion, and to remember that when Christ says to the sorrowing, "Weep not," he is able himself soon to dry their tears. Our words of sympathy are often cold. They give less comfort sometimes than in our hearts we long to impart. Often one remains silent, because he feels that his words are too bold, even though they come from the heart in all sincerity. Often the grasp of the hand is more eloquent than words which our lips strive to utter. But it is not so with Christ. When he says, "Weep not," he himself soon wipes away the tears. He came down from heaven to anticipate that time which is promised us when "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." Christ can do it; Christ did it; Christ still does it.

Notice, in the second place, Christ's triumphant command.

The Procession Stopped.

The young men laid the bier upon the ground. We know not whether it was a bier, or, as we might say, a coffin; both were used, and both are used still in Palestine and in Greece. Travelers tell us it is usual now in Palestine to dress the dead in their ordinary clothing, and to bear them out either upon a bier or upon a very shallow coffin, but a coffin so constructed that it would be quite possible for one to sit upright or leap out of it, if life were not extinct. The shroud is not placed upon the body until the grave is reached. I mention this fact, because it is well to remember that it was quite easy and natural for this young man to arise. If he had been already wrapped in a shroud it would have been difficult for him to have arisen; but he was not so wrapped; it was not the custom then; it is not the custom now. Not until the grave is reached is the long shroud or winding sheet wound about the corpse as it was about Lazarus, around every limb. But this young man was dressed in his ordinary clothing. If he lay in a coffin it was uncovered, and the cover was carried in front of him. His face was perfectly exposed, and the rest of his form covered with some light garment which was carefully thrown over him. I state these facts to illustrate how perfectly true to the customs of that day, and to those of this day this narrative is; how perfectly in harmony with the facts of the case are the statements of the evangelist,

Personal Contact.

Our Lord bade the procession stop. He came nearer. There was authority in Christ's person. He awed men into silence by his presence. That procession felt that a kingly man was before them. Power went out from Jesus even though his lips were silent. He came up close to the bier; that was Christ's rule. When the Lord blessed men he came close to them. When he would lift up the poor lunatic boy, he took him by the hand. When he would restore the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue, he takes her by the hand that he may give her to her mother. When he healed men who were deaf, he put his fingers into their ears; when he healed men who were dumb, he put his finger on their tongues. These acts were not necessary; for he could heal with a word when necessary, as in the case of the Centurion's servant; the wonderful miracle wrought the very day before the raising of the widow's son, and at a great distance from the one sick. Nevertheless, it was Christ's rule to come close to men whom he would help. We may not enlarge upon this thought further now, but you can learn a very interesting lesson from this fact. You cannot do effective work for Christ at long range. You must get close to men if you are going to help them. Sometimes there is much of the Gospel in the warm grasp of the hand; there is vast power in a word of kindness. The preacher and church that shorten their weapons make them more effective. This blessed Bible is the sword of the spirit, and if you and I are to wield that sword effectively,

We Must Come Close to Men.

The pulpit is too far away from the pews; the preacher too far away from his people; some pulpits are dying of dignity; some churches are shorn of power, because of their supposed respectability. We must, my friends, come close to men. Christ came close to this dead young man. Would that we knew how to come close to men, that we could put our heart into our hand, all warm with a Saviour's love, and give it to them as we grasp them by the hand! We must do it, if the Church of Christ is to accomplish the mission which God intends it should accomplish for a lost world.

Jesus touched the bier, and they that bore the dead stood still; then Christ uttered his irresistible command, "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!" What majesty! I who am the resurrection and the life; I who am the fountain of life, say unto you, "Young man, arise!" It is sublime to stand beside this life-giving Lord. I feel the power of my Lord as I utter these words. There was no delay. No time of prayer and of passionate effort as in the case of Elijah and Elisha, but only this simple, authoritative utterance; the dead heard and obeyed. It was as easy for Christ to raise the dead from the bier as for another to raise the sleeping from the bed.

It might seem ludicrous for a strolling Rabbi to so speak to one who is dead; but there was neither time nor room for doubt or comment—"He that was dead sat up, and began to speak." So Christ spoke to the man with the withered arm, "Stretch forth thine hand." Well might the man have said, "Why that is a strange command; for years this withered arm has hung dangling at my side, how can I stretch it forth?" But with the word Christ gave the power also. That hand was stretched forth and was restored wholy like the other. So was power given in this case; and so it is still often in the preaching of this blessed Gospel. Men are like this young man, dead, dead in trespasses and sins. Perhaps there are young men here who are spiritually dead, whose hearts do not throb with the life of God, who have never felt the power of divine life. And I stand here in Christ's name and say, "Arise from the dead!" As I give the command Christ will accompany it with his power and you also may arise from the dead even as did the widow's son of Nain.

It is exceedingly touching for us to notice the evidences of his restoration to life, for we are told that he that was dead sat up and began to speak. The evidence of Christ's power was instantaneous.

The Man Sat up and Spoke.

Spiritually this was significant. Men who have heard Christ's voice are no longer to retain the posture of dead men. They are to arise; they are to sit up and testify. The young man began to speak. What wonderful things he might have told us, but no word comes from the world of spirits. No voice comes in the case of Lazarus. You have often been startled at that. I doubt not that he began to speak the praises of the power of divine life and love, in the same manner as the man whose eyes were opened followed Christ glorifying God. Men who have been restored by Christ must at once begin to speak. A dumb Christian is a contradiction. The man whose lips have been touched by the finger of Christ must declare the glory of Christ. It is very sad that in so many of our prayer-meetings we have men and women who for the most part are afflicted with a dumb spirit. It ought not to be so. If your feet have been taken out of the miry clay, and have been put upon the Rock, and a new song has been put into your mouth you ought to glorify the grace of Jesus Christ. Not to acknowledge Christ is to deny Christ. If I am speaking to any who profess to be Christians and who have never had a voice to declare the love and the grace of God, suffer this word of exhortation. It is to be feared that you have not experienced the love of Christ in your heart, for out of the fullness of the heart the mouth

Must Speak His Praise.

Have you known Christ? Begin to speak of him. Say with Cennick:

> Then will I tell to sinners round,
> What a dear Saviour I have found.

Young men, do it to-morrow. Do it in your office. Do it in your store. Do it in your boarding-house. Sit up, stand up and speak out as witnesses for him who has called you out of darkness into his marvelous light.

Still further we read, "And he delivered him to his mother." He had not belonged to her for some time. Perhaps during his illness she had begun to feel that he was no longer hers; he was slipping away from her. That is a trying time in a mother's life when the son of her love is going from her. Often have I gone to the bedside of the sick and have seen all that medical skill could do, done in vain; I have seen all that loving hearts could suggest prove useless, and as we have seen the beloved ones floating out, the cables slipping and their ship sailing into the sea so broad and deep, floating away to that land that is so near and yet so far off, we fully realized that our loved ones no longer belonged to us. Then death comes and suddenly our phraseology changes. We begin to speak another way. We speak of the body, we speak of the remains; we do not speak of the person; he is no longer ours. I am sometimes saddened by the thought of the suddeness of that change. It may be a wife, a husband, a child, yet the language is inevitable, because it corresponds to the truth. They no longer belong to us, they have gone from us. There is the casket; but the jewel is missing. So, doubtless, it was in the thought of this widow of Nain.

The Mother's Joy.

How beautiful is this action on the part of Christ, even as was the other act on the part of Elijah! What an anxious heart was in that mother's breast. While Elijah was up-stairs in the loft with the dead boy, pleading for him, pacing that apartment in the agony of despair, throwing himself upon the dead, and then praying to God again, with what emotions must that mother have heard their steps as they came down. It was a touching sight. Christ "delivered him to his mother."

I think that something quite analogous to this takes place in the spiritual resurrection. Young men and women are twice their mother's when they have given their hearts to their mother's God. There is a great gulf between every parent and child if the parent is a Christian and the child is not. And when God comes by his grace and converts our children he takes his hand out of his bosom a second time, and delivers to us our children. I can think of a son once fallen. Year after year the mother prayed, and yet she went her way alone, and he went his. Hers was the narrow path; his was the broad road. But God was gracious. He heard her prayer and turned her son's feet into the narrow path, and if God had spoken by an audible voice he could not have more really given that son to his mother than he did. Soon, side by side, they went to the house of God; soon she heard his voice in prayer and praise, and he was born again, not only born again into the kingdom of God but born again into that mother's heart and life.

Sons Dead to their Mothers.

Ah, that is a beautiful picture; Christ gave the boy to his mother's heart. Perhaps there are some mothers here whose boys do not belong to them in this sense. They are absent from them. It may be some young man is present this morning who has left father and mother behind and left the God of his father and mother also, and has come to this great city and has gone into the ways of sin. Oh, will you not listen to the voice of Jesus? He says, "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!" Will you not permit Christ with his mighty and tender arm to bring you back to himself, and to give you back to your mother?

Again, this is prophetic. All these raisings from the dead are prophetic of the great resurrection at the last day. The ruler's daughter is given to her parents, the widow's son is given back to his mother, and Lazarus is restored to his sisters. Is not this raising prophetic of that great day when families long separated shall again be united? Is there not to be a great delivering up of those once dead to one another? I love to think of this as prophetic. We are to see the come back again. I recently attended the funeral of one whose wife had died a little time before, and during all his last hours she seemed to be near him. He called her by name and spoke to her as if she were just within sight, within hearing. Perhaps Jesus was delivering him to her and her to him. And I think it will give a tenderer joy to the bliss of heaven that those we have known and loved on earth we may know and love again in the kingdom of God's dear Son.

In closing, notice how this miracle stirred the hearts of the people, bringing fear upon all and leading them to glorify God, and to rejoice that a great prophet was risen up in Israel. For four hundred years the voice of prophecy had been silent, but that voice is once more heard. And what was true of the effect upon them is true always of the presence of Christ's power upon any community. When men are raised from the dead and when Christians are girded with power, fear comes upon the people; they are led to glorify God.

God grant that the resurrection power of Jesus Christ may come to all our hearts, that we may arise to walk in newness of life and to enjoy the foretaste of that day when the dead in earth and sea shall come forth in obedience to the mighty voice of Christ, who is "the resurrection and the life!"

A SUPERFLUOUS PRIEST.

A CHEERING incident is reported by a correspondent of the Baptist Missionary Magazine who says: The early triumphs of the mission among the Karens in Burmah are recalled by the story of a visit of one of our Christian preachers to a remote Karen district on the borders of Siam. He found the people very well to do, some having as many as one hundred and twenty elephants. They had built for themselves large Buddhist temples and monasteries. When the preacher asked them if they understood what they worshipped, they said they did not, and listened with great attention while he unfolded the doctrine of the true and living God. That night their Buddhist priest ran away, seeing that his occupation was gone, and the people asked the preacher to remain in his place, and agreed to give up the worship of idols and send their children to his school if he would stay. He remained for a time, and at last reports two hundred were asking baptism.

KING JESUS.

KING Jesus is coming,
His kingdom to take;
And Satan, and all of
His servants, may quake.
King Jesus is coming,
We know not how near;
Or if he in person
On earth will appear.

The light of that coming
His foes will dismay;
The breath of his mouth
Will proud Antichrist slay.
All nations will crown him
The King of all kings;
All knees are bowed to him,
Each lip homage brings.

King Jesus is calling
His servants to-day,
To rise in his might,
And his banner display.
With darkness and evil
Unceasing war wage,
Each one in his station,
From youth to old age.

King Jesus will call us
From earth very soon,
He may come at midnight,
At morning or noon.
Work while 'tis yet daylight;
Night fast cometh on.
Our rest will be sweet when
He sayeth—"Well done." —M.J.J.

THE WORLD AFTER THE ADVENT.

The Events to Occur at and After the Second Coming of Christ.

BY THE VERY REV. DEAN BAGOT.

AS soon as the purpose for which this present dispensation has been established shall have been fully accomplished, Christ will come back to the world to set up that kingdom for the coming of which he has directed his Church to pray. That his kingdom shall be established at the time of his Second Coming, is evident from what he himself announces in Matt. 25: 31: "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." And according to the declaration of the prophet Daniel, he receives his kingdom when he comes in the clouds.

The locality of the Saviour's kingdom shall be on the earth, for it is expressly said by the same prophet that "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the saints of the Most High" (Daniel 7: 27), and, furthermore, it is said in the Book of the Revelation that when the seventh angel sounds, there are great voices in heaven saying, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." And there is a propriety in this, that the place which was once the scene of the Saviour's sufferings should become the theatre of his future glory.

When the Lord returns to our world he will begin to give effect to his great plan of redemption, by bringing about those events which are necessary for that end. Then shall the day of Judgment commence, even that day to which the Apostle Paul referred in his sermon at Athens—"Because he hath appointed a day, in which he shall judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom he hath ordained." This day is not a period of twelve or twenty-four hours' duration, but extends over the entire length of the period which is called the Millennium, for as the whole of this present dispensation is called "the day of salvation," so the whole of the dispensation after this, and which is to be ushered in by the coming of our Lord, is called "the day of judgment." The judgment of those who shall be alive upon the earth when he comes is described in Matt. 25: 31–46. At his Second Advent he will also raise up his people who have died in the faith and hope of the Gospel. The dead in Christ shall rise first; they shall have dominion over the wicked in the morning, as they shall be raised incorruptible at the commencement of the eternal day of glory; and then shall those saints who shall be alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord be changed by his divine power, assuming bodies that shall be incorruptible and immortal. Thus shall all his people be admitted into his kingdom, and share with him in the work of judgment, and reign with him on the earth, partaking of his glory. They shall not die any more, for they shall be equal to the angels, and shall be the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Those amongst the living when the Lord comes who are not his believing people, shall be shut out of the Millennial kingdom; among these death shall take place as it does now, and to them the Gospel will be preached with a power and success that was never known before.

But it is most important to attend this—that the Millennial period is not the final, but only a preparatory dispensation; it is not the glory, but only the dawn of that day. It is the time during which the Saviour gives effect to his great purposes of redemption, and prepares the world for becoming the residence of his happy and glorified people throughout the eternal reign of blessedness which is to follow. The distinction may be seen from the fact of its being stated that those who are partakers of the first resurrection shall reign with Christ a thousand years, while it is afterwards said (in Rev. 22: 5), that they shall reign for ever and ever. At the end of the Millennial reign, we are told that Satan, who had been bound and restrained during that period, shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive—not those who are within the Millennial kingdom, but—the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, and shall bring them up against the saints of God. This insurrection, however, instead of being at all successful, shall only give occasion for the utter destruction of all the wicked from the face of the earth, for then shall take place the general resurrection and the general judgment; and after that, the earth, which was, perhaps, partially renovated at the commencement of the Millennium, shall be completely delivered from the curse. It shall not, as some suppose, be annihilated, but the heaven and the earth shall be changed into a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

LUCK GOOD AND BAD.

WE hear many people talking about "good luck." But things are not at loose ends. Behave yourself well, and things will come out about right; sin against God—and matters will come out all wrong. He who cheats and lies and swears, will always have bad luck. He who faithfully serves God will always have good luck. When we see a boy coming in from a street fight, with bruised eye, and soiled coat, and rough behavior, we say, "That boy has had bad luck." When we see a girl with a pouting lip, cross and snarlish, and hard to please, saying sharp things to her mother, and making herself, in the house and school, very disagreeable, we are apt to say, "That girl has had very bad luck."

But it would be better to talk more of the kind Providence that arranges our lot, and less of chance. There is no such thing as luck; our blessings are more than our losses. People ought to hunt more for marigolds and buttercups, and less for burs and thistles. We could not tell you how many times we have met with what people call good luck. If we were about to start on a journey, and wanted fair weather, though we heard it storm in the night, we have almost always found that the sun shone brightly in the morning. If we had a bad cold, and feared that we would not be able to preach next Sabbath, by the time the day came we were hale and healthy. If some one stole our umbrella, we generally found that an unknown person had lost his umbrella in our entry. We left our cane in the cars, but a friend presented us with another. Our carriage broke down, but we got the benefit of exercise in walking. We missed the train, but by that means escaped a terrible accident.

A steamboat on the Hudson River took fire, but we had chosen that same night to go on the other one that came through undamaged. We never knew an unkind thing to be said about us, but it in some way turned out to our advantage. We had an unexpected call for $20, and from the gutter on Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, we picked up a pocket-book containing $20. Almost everything that we expected to turn out wrong has turned out right. We have been fortunate in selecting our grocer, our tailor, our doctor, and our friends. We were born in a very good place, at just the right time, [illegible] We would not trade off our circumstances for anybody else's circumstances.

We have had what people call good luck in the morning, good luck at noon, and good luck in the evening. We have trod on many sharp thorns, and drank [illegible] dark skies, but still we can say, "Goodness and mercy have followed us all the days of our life." Henceforth let us give more time to thinking of our joys, and less of our vexations. That is what we mean by hunting more for marigolds and buttercups, and less for burs and thistles.

BETTER TIMES FOR TOIL.

WE congratulate American labor upon the fact that it is coming to more appreciation than ever before. There is not a circle of refinement or culture in which you do not find there men who have fought their own way up; with the toil of their hand, with the toil of their foot, and with the toil of their brain gaining those positions. So we have come to the conclusion in this country, when we find a man contemptuous of labor, and acting as though he never worked at all, and as though his ancestors had never worked, we make up our mind that if you go a little further back in that man's ancestral line you will run against a scavenger's cart or upset a soap-boiler's kettle. The question in this country is becoming more and more, not who was your father? or who was your mother? or who were your grand-parents? but who are you? what are you doing for your country? what are you doing for your God? what is your moral character? When the Congressional halls shall next open, there will be the representatives of every trade there present,—farmers, teamsters, plumbers, shipwrights, drovers, masons, carpenters. The crowbar of the Pennsylvania miner, the flail of the New Hampshire yeomanry, the axe of the Oregon settler, the buzz of the Lowell carpet factory will have their echo in the Congressional halls of Washington. There will be enough farmers there to see that agricultural interests are defended; there will be enough manufacturers there to stand up for the American shuttle; there will be enough sea-coast men there to look out for the fisheries; there will be enough miners there to defend the coal shafts; and if, in any Legislature in this country, or in any Congress, a man should rise up, contemptuous of human toil, and propose a bill that would degrade American labor, his name would be dropped; it would be ground under the potter's wheel, and bored of the cabinetmaker's bit, and split of the settler's hatchet, and torn of the farmer's corn-thresher, and consumed in the furnace of the gas-fitter. We bless God that human toil is coming to a higher appreciation, and that, in this country, if a man will be industrious and honest and pure-hearted toward God and man, he will be respected and honored.

What opportunities are opening on every side for men who have a mind to work! The farm says, "Strike deeper the plough, and we will send up mightier harvests." The forest says, "Bring on the lumbermen, and we will float all the rivers with material for navies and cities." The waters say, "Strike out with your fishing-smacks, and cast the net on the right side of the ship, and you shall see miracles of floundering wealth in the cod and shad and mackerel." And joining in the great song of American industry are the deep bass of the rolling-mills, and the soprano of the turner's saw, and the drum of the grist-mill, and the shrill piping of steam-whistles, and the chime of factory-bells all along the Susquehanna, the Connecticut, and the Merrimac. But all that has been done is but little compared with the field opening to-day before the mechanic and agriculturist. Not an acre of American soil has yet done its best; not one wheel but it might have easier motion; not one hulk but it could make quicker time. O, when shall all the prairies be redeemed and all the table-lands be brought under cultivation; and the thousands of acres, where now only the deer browse and the wolf barks and the panther screams, surrender their mines of gold and harvests of corn at our feet? God lays down before us the map of this continent, and says, "Look at your inheritance. Go where you will. Do you like the cold? Go up by the Northern lakes. Do you want summer to glow in your veins? Go to California. Do you want adventure? Set your face toward the Rocky Mountains. Are you satisfied with the place you have? Stay at home, gather a competency, educate your children, please your wife, serve God, and die an honest man and a Christian."

"EDUCATED BEN."

WE were standing on the piazza of the hotel at Saratoga, one summer, looking across toward a tent which had painted on the outside an advertisement of the wonderful things that were being performed inside by a highly cultivated pig called "educated Ben." The boy in us said: "You had better go over and see it," but professional propriety made us hesitate. While we were discussing the matter within ourselves, and our capacity to withstand the temptation was getting weaker and weaker, we found three prominent clergymen, one of the Episcopal Church, one of the Presbyterian Church, and the other of the Reformed Church, who were resolved to go. We immediately said: "If they are going it must be respectable to go." In ten minutes we were all at the exhibition. At the bidding of the exhibitor, "educated Ben" told the time of day by a watch, the ages of the auditors, the year of their birth having first been given, and played a game of cards in which none of the clergymen participated. It was wondrous beyond all description.

Ever since reading Æsop's Fables, in boyhood, we have been in the habit of moralizing, and this performance of the learned pig set us a-going in that direction, and we thought how many educated Bens there are in the world.

First, there are the learned men who, from something in their temperament, may be said to be all bristles. You cannot smooth them down. They are covered with sharp, disagreeable points. Now-a-days when we meet with such men, we feel that all their attainments cannot make up for their sharpnesses of demeanor, and we say within ourselves that they are no more nor less than educated Bens.

In this company, also, we place those who with large acquirements, prefer the mire. Let this prodigy of the Saratoga exhibition get off of its clean platform and loose in the street, its first pilgrimage would be to the mud puddles. So there are educated men who are fond of the mire. They have a genius for dirt. You see it in the subjects on which they write, and in the unclean stories they tell. They would rather wallow than soar. Educated Bens.

In this company are the learned men who are uncleanly in their personal appearance. Some of them take pride in shaving but once a week. Their glory is a begrimed shirt collar. Their finger-nails in mourning for a dead bar of soap. Not able to get Horace Greeley's brains and heart, they come as near to him as possible by upholstering the top of their left boot with a profusion of pantaloons. No amount of genius can atone for uncleanliness of person or dress. Yet we have seen in exquisite circles many "Educated Bens."

Let our scholarly men remember that they are watched and imitated by soft heads, who will get chiefly their shortcomings, and while the leaders of the taste of the world are careful to have their minds polished, let them not despise the Christian duty of having their bodies made presentable. There are men who imagine themselves to be Lord Byrons, merely because they have jerked their "turn over collar" clear down, till the button breaks off.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

GOOD WOMEN.

THERE came one day, at the close of the service, a little body, and poured out the following tale of woe: "O, he is such a good husband, but is not a Christian; what can I do?" She had come to me for soul help, just as folks go to doctors for bodily help; and just as they do, I began at once to diagnose the case; for how can one prescribe, except he knows the disease? I knew there was some reason for his being out of the Church. I knew more, and that was, that he, like all men, had an entrance to the heart, and if once found, the citadel can be taken. So I plied her with questions. I found he had been brought up right. He had a good, Christian mother; there was a time when he used to pray. I asked her if he prayed now?"

"No; not that I know of."

"Do you pray?"

"Oh, yes sir; all the time."

"No, not that; I mean do you have stated seasons and places for prayer?"

"Oh, yes."

"What are they?"

"Every morning and night."

"Do you pray out loud?"

"No; oh, no. Never!"

I said to her, "Your husband can be converted."

"Oh! Can he? Can he? Tell me how?"

"Kneel down there by your bed and pray out loud for his immediate salvation."

"I can't! I can't! I never prayed out loud in my life."

"But you can."

"No, Mr. Yatman, I cannot."

"Yes, you can," said I; "you can buy a bonnet, can't you?"

She thought me trifling, when I spoke about "buying bonnets"—I saw it in her face.

"Oh, I know you can pray out loud, for it takes a heap of talking to buy a bonnet, and if your tongue can go for that, it can go in prayer for your husband."

I well knew it could.

We turned to that marvelous verse, so much needed by those in heavy straits, 2 Corinthians, 9:8: "God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound unto every good work."

Together we read, together we prayed; and I left her not till she gave me the promise she would do as I told her.

A fortnight after that I saw her. Her face was the picture of joy. I knew what had happened. "Tell me about it, won't you?" I felt if she would, it might help me to help others. And so she told me:

"After we separated that day, when I gave you my promise 'to pray out loud,' I felt as though I had promised to lift a mountain. Some days went by, but the burden got so heavy I could not carry it. So one morning I told Jesus he must help me for that night. I would keep my promise—I would pray out loud. At breakfast, my husband noticed my face was flushed, and asked me if I were ill, or had fever. I told him 'no.' When he came home to dinner at six, I could scarcely look at him, knowing what was to come. Again he asked me about the high color in my face. I turned it off as best I could. We had a lovely evening together. He read, and then, by-and-bye, said: 'Come, my dear; it's getting late.' I thought I could never get up stairs; my knees but just gave out, I prayed inwardly, and we prepared to retire, as usual. He got in bed; then I got down and silently asked the great God to help me; in a moment I forgot he was there; I forgot my fears; I forgot everything, save that my husband needed salvation, and was pouring out my petitions aloud, 'that God would save him,' 'make him a Christian,' 'save his life and years, as well as his soul.' And, sir; the first conscious knowledge I had of his presence was his arm about my waist, saying: 'Wife, wife, keep on praying, keep on praying. I must be saved now.' And he, too, prayed. We both prayed together; and when I got up from my bedside, I had a new husband, for he was saved."

Oh, women! pray them in, pray them in. Few men can long withstand the prayers of a good and noble wife; fewer still can withstand their audible cries.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

COURTESIES IN MOROCCO.

FOREIGN visitors to Morocco are not usually well received. Neither to the Sultan nor his people is the European a welcome guest. As long as it was possible, the foreigner was excluded from the country, and now that he is admitted, the restrictions are contrived so as to be irksome to him. The Sultan has, however, deemed it prudent to be at least courteous to one visitor who is now in his dominions. Sir West Ridgeway has gone to him as a representative of the English Government and has been received with as much cordiality as the Moor can bring himself to extend to one whom he regards as an infidel. The illustration on this page represents the envoy and his party being escorted to the official quarters. The object of the visit is to restore friendly relations between England and Morocco. The Sultan having paid the indemnity for the Englishman who was killed in the riot of last year and having apologized for the insult to Sir Charles Euan-Smith, to whom he offered a bribe, all grounds of offence are supposed to have been removed and Sir West Ridgeway is sent to renew friendly overtures. He is a man of less dignity and more tact than Sir Charles Euan-Smith, and may be more successful in negotiating a treaty of commerce which is doubtless his real business. He is one of the officials of the Irish Government, and has given proof of his fitness for such a mission as this in the fact that he is popular alike with the English and Irish in Dublin. It may be hoped, for the sake of the Moors themselves, that he will win the favor of his majesty, Mulai Hassan. England doubtless sees her way to profit in a commercial treaty, but it is the Moors who most need the commerce, and the civilization which would result from it. At present there is no outlet for their productions and the people are poor and miserable while possessing commodities which the English would gladly purchase. Contact with Europeans might also lead them to understand something of national liberty and progress of which now they know nothing. But the chief advantage to be hoped for is that they might hear the Gospel which is able to make them wise unto salvation. (II. Tim. 3:15.)

A Scared Tippler.

THE curious taste in ornaments of a Colorado mine-owner caused a Chicago man a terrible fright a few days ago. The mine-owner has been spending the winter in Florida and while there captured a chameleon of remarkable beauty. It had a body about an inch long with a fine tapering tail. Following a fashion in vogue in the State he decided to wear it as an ornament. A gold chain so fine as to be almost invisible attached its body to his scarf and the little creature soon became at home on his person. During a visit to Chicago he wore the strange ornament which was much admired. But one day in his hotel it attracted the attention of a man whose sight was not very clear, owing to the frequent potations of liquor. He looked intently at the novel scarf ornament and then rubbed his eyes and looked again. He moved as close as he could to the stranger and his face grew pale as he gazed. The stranger made a slight movement and the chameleon ran rapidly to the end of its chain hiding itself under his vest. Then the drinking man fell back against the bar. Holding up his hand he said, "I never thought I would come to this; I'll never drink another drop of liquor as long as I live." As that was a very desirable resolution on his part, he was not informed that the phenomenon he had supposed to be the first symptom of an attack of delirium tremens had so simple and natural a cause. An habitually sober man would not have been scared by the spectacle but an accusing conscience made him quail. "The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are bold as a lion." (Prov. 28: 1.)

A Narrow Escape.

During the great fire in Boston, Mass., on March 10, a fireman had a marvelous escape from death. When the fire was at its height he was seen at a window on the eighth story of a high building, of which the lower stories were burning fiercely. There was no ladder which could reach so high, and it looked as if the man must surely die. He was seen, however, to sway himself out of the window and clutch an electric cable containing several light wires, which crossed the street. Then he was recognized as chief of one of the fire-brigades, and it was remembered that he had been confined to the house by a broken collar-bone. The crowd below watched him anxiously as he swung at the dizzy height, and the firemen brought a net and spread below, in case he should fall. Dense masses of smoke surrounded him, and the flames from the burning building came perilously near him, but the man held on and slowly worked his way, hand over hand along the cable, to the middle of the street. The firemen shouted to him to hold on, but he was evidently getting very weak. Eventually, the firemen succeeded in detaching one end of the cable, which they gently and carefully lowered, while on a ladder, set up on the other side, were firemen ready to catch the swinging man when he was lowered within their reach. In this way he was brought safely down, and was carried fainting to a place of safety. The firemen have often protested against the overhead wires, which are a hindrance to them in their work, but for once they were the means of saving a valuable life. There are many evils in life that are hard to bear, which the Christian is encouraged to submit to patiently, trusting his heavenly Father to overrule them for good. (Genesis 50 : 20.)

THE BRITISH COMMISSIONER'S ARRIVAL IN MOROCCO.

Constructive Damages.

A NOVEL question of law has just been decided by the Court of Appeals of New York State. It arose out of the suit of a widow for the loss of her husband's life. She and her husband and their little boy were walking across a bridge over one of the State canals. The bridge was unguarded and the little boy fell over into the water. His father jumped in to rescue him, but both he and the child were drowned. The State authorities accepted responsibility for the death of the child and paid the widow's claim on its account. But they demurred to her claim for the death of her husband. They pleaded that his death was not due to the absence of the guard-rail, because he did not fall into the water, but voluntarily jumped in, as he probably would have done if a guard-rail had been there. The Court of Appeals has sustained the widow's claim. In delivering judgment the Court said that, although, the immediate cause of the man's death was his paternal instinct to save his child's life, the necessity for doing so would not have arisen if the State had not been negligent in leaving the bridge unprotected. The State must be held responsible for all the consequences of its negligence and the man's death was one of them. There is no question as to the decision being morally right and the principle applies in matters that do not come before the courts. A parent's negligence in training his child, or a Christian's inconsistencies have far-reaching consequences which he is powerless to control. (Rom. 14: 7.)

The Chief Justice's Love Letter.

An amusing incident in connection with the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court is reported in the Washington Post. It states that Mr. Fuller, having occasion to consult his physician, walked around to his residence. A man who has recently been engaged by the physician, opened the door to him. He said that his employer was out, but had left word that he would soon return. He evidently had no idea of the exalted position of the gentleman he was addressing, but seemed to have confidence in him, for he invited him into the physician's library to wait until he returned. The Chief Justice accepted, and seated himself in his old friend's chair. He had barely done so when the serving man came in, and in an embarrassed way asked if the gentleman would do him a favor while he waited. He had a sweetheart, he said, and was very anxious to send her a letter, but unhappily he could not write. If the gentleman would write it for him, he would feel deeply grateful. Without hesitation Mr. Fuller acquiesced, and, taking up a pen, wrote probably the most unique letter ever penned by his hand. It would be a treasure to the autograph collector, but its value to the girl who received it, would consist in its being a message from her lover. If it told her what she wanted to know, she would care very little by whom it was written. If Christians had the same feeling about their heavenly Father's message, there would be less acrimony in the theological disputes which have so long agitated the church (2. Peter 1 :21).

An Ungrateful Man.

A singular case of ingratitude is reported in a journal of the State of Washington. A farmer, sixty years of age, had occasion to go through a forest in Clarke County. On his way he disturbed an exceptionally fierce she bear, who chased him. The farmer was unarmed, and realized that his only chance of escape lay in his running powers. Those were not so good as in his youth, but he made the best speed he could. He succeeded in getting out of the forest and reaching the open country, but the bear kept up the pursuit. He soon found that he was getting weak from the unwonted exertion, while the bear was as fresh as at the start, and was gaining on him. He knew that some distance ahead was a farm on which he could take refuge, and he made a desperate effort to reach it. Fortunately for him, a lady who happened to be alone in the farmhouse saw his plight from an upper window, and hurried down with a gun. Just as the bear almost touched him, a well-aimed shot from the lady's rifle rolled her over, and the man was saved. Then the ungrateful man claimed the hide, as the finder of the bear, and would not admit the right of his rescuer, as the person who killed it. A dispute ensued, which was ultimately settled by the compromise, to which the man reluctantly agreed, that the hide be sold, and the proceeds be divided between himself and the lady who had saved him. One would have thought that nothing he had would have been good enough for him to give to the person to whom he owed his life. But gratitude is not a common virtue. The cause of Christ would not languish as it does for want of funds if men proved by their gifts their consciousness of what they really owe to him (Philemon 19).

BRIEF NOTES.

Madam Tel Sono's many friends will be glad to know that she is receiving a very hearty and cordial reception in England.

A large meeting of girls employed as clerks in stores in Berlin, has been held to demand complete Sunday rest. A resolution was adopted that they should have a day of rest guaranteed by law.

Major Whittle and Mr. Stebbins are holding a mission in Belfast, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The meetings commenced last month and will continue all through March. Much good is being done.

There are now over one hundred medical missionaries in China, and fifty-six of them are women. They reaeh those who are beyond the reach of male missionaries, even though physicians, and touch the home life as no others can.

The Synod of the Russian Church has decided to undertake a revision of the Russian Bible, and has intrusted the undertaking to a number of prominent Russian theologians and scholars. The movement is being pushed energetically, and the revision is expected to be soon ready for publication.

Evangelist E. P. Telford closed his meetings at Newport, L. I., on March 10. He is now conducting meetings at the Presbyterian Church, Freeport, L. I., at the close of which he goes to Newark, N. J., to the Clinton Avenue Reformed Church, where preparations for a great work are being made.

As an evidence of the value of revival work a minister in Baltimore, Md., writes that during the recent services of Messrs. Moody and Sankey in that city, the most earnest and devoted workers were Christians who were converted as young men under Mr. Moody's preaching when he was there many years ago.

The Young Men's Christian Association of London, has been carrying a heavy burden in the mortgage on its building, Exeter Hall, London. An anonymous gift of $25,000 in liquidation of it was handed in recently by a gentleman who said he wished in that way to express his obligation to the institution.

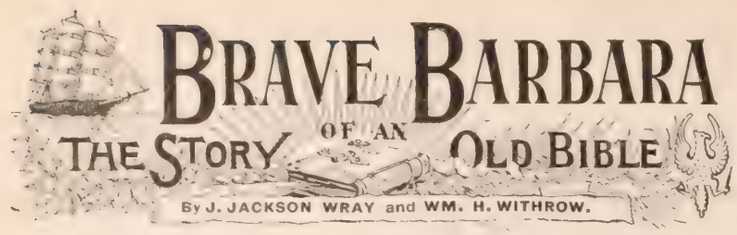
A proposition has been made in France to form a federal union of the Protestant Churches in France—including the Lutheran, Reformed, Free, Methodist, and Baptist Churches—for common action in matters concerning the relation of the churches to the government, and in their attitude toward the Roman Catholic Church.

Bishops Newman and Hurst of the M. E. Church have been appointed a committee to wait upon the President and call his attention to the imprisonment by the goverment of Brazil of Prof. J. H. Nelson. It is hoped that the State Department will issue instructions to our minister there to move actively for his liberation.

There is a strong religious feeling in some districts of Ireland against Home Rule The Protestants believe that there will be no religious liberty in the country if the pending bill is passed. Special prayers are being offered in every church in the dioceses of Down, Connor and Dromore that God would avert the danger apparently impending.

The latest annual report of the Hawaiian Evangelical Association gives the statistics of the churches which have grown out of the work of the American Board in those islands. They count 5,427 members of the Hawaiian-speaking churches, with 4,916 in the Sabbath school; there are also 1,190 members in English, Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese and German churches connected with the Association.

It is gratifying to learn from Washington dispatches that however radical may be the difference between the political principles of the President and the ex-President, they are in harmony on the subject of the observance of the Lord's Day. Several days before the inauguration, Mr. Cleveland learning that it had been proposed to use the Pension Building for a Sunday concert telegraphed to the Secretary of the Interior: "I am strongly opposed to the use of the Pension Building for a Sunday concert on the fifth inst., and object to regarding such a thing as a feature of the inauguration." Secretary Noble telegraphed in reply: "Your telegram received. Orders were issued already forbidding the use of the Pension Building Sunday, and I am gratified that this action is in accordance with your wishes."



CHAPTER IV.

PROSPERITY AND DECLENSION.

GLIDING slowly, but smoothly, with the low coast of Long Island on the one hand, and then the yellow curve of Sandy Hook and Staten Island on the other, the Colleen Bawn passed through the Narrows, and, rounding the green slopes of what are now known as the "Heights of Brooklyn," dropped anchor hard by the wooden quay which served to meet the requirements of the port of New York.

How strangely different was the scene which met the eyes of our little band of adventurers, along those final stages of their voyage, from that which greets the traveler over the same route to-day!

When the Colleen Bawn spread her brown sails above the waters of the spacious and magnificent bay and harbor, New York—a quaint Dutch town, with some few thousands of inhabitants, covering but a small patch on the eastern corner of the now million-peopled Island of Manhattan—gave no promise, in its low, mean, wooden structures, and sluggish business fashions, of the sumptuous, Babel-voiced city of to-day.

Hearty "Good-byes" were interchanged between our immigrants from the mother country and the genial Captain O'Connor, who had piloted them with so skilful a hand and so stout a heart across the sea. Barbara Heck did not fail to press upon the skipper a hearty offer of "bed and board" should Providence bring him within hail of the roof-tree under which she and her good man Paul hoped to find a home.

"Thank you, kindly," said the skipper, as he held her hand in his, half-lingeringly, as it seemed, and with a sailor-grip. "An' sure, Misthress Heck, the light av your face an' the swate flavor av your voice will be a pleasant mimory with Phaylim O'Connor for many a day;" and so they parted, the Romanist and the Methodist, strong and true in their mutual regard, despite all that the antagonisms of creed and customs had done to hinder.

Captain O'Connor was very loth to part with his "cabin-boy," Michael Finnigan. That rising genius, who had baptized himself "Lucky Mike," had beeome of real use and service to the skipper, and he would fain have kept him by his side.

"Sure, an' you've the makings of a capital sailor in you, Mike Finnigan," said the skipper, as Mike was standing by his "Misthress Aroon," ready to follow as soon as she should leave the ship. "Come back with me to ould Ireland. I've got a dacent home for you in Limerick, down by the Shannon shore, an' my wife an' me have nayther chick nor child—"

"It's the koind heart ye hev, Captain, an' it's myself that knows it, for Oi niver had a friend but you, barren' wan," he said, looking at Barbara in a way that might well have convinced the Captain that his request was useless, "an' more between, the misthress hez pussuaded Another Wan to take me in hand, and be this an' be that, Captain; sure, on' Oi'll never laive, neither the wan nor t' Other av 'em, for iver and iver, Amen! You've been a moighty good friend to me, Captain, an' sure ivery pit-pat av my heart says' 'Thank-ye.' May the blessed saints—no," said he, correcting himself, "may the good God bless ye all the days av your life, an' whin you die, may the 'ivens be your bed."

Mike's eyes were red, and so, in sooth, were Captain O'Connor's. The skipper shook him warmly by the hand, and left a piece of gold in his palm. "You're right, boy, "stick close by Misthress Heck, and may you be Lucky Mike, all the days av your life!"

Barbara looked at her young henchman, and smiled approvingly. Mike looked at his patroness and then at the captain, and laughed his satisfaction and delight; then, being the [illegible] Barbara, escorted by her good man, Paul, with happy Mike Finnigan close behind her, was soon hidden in the narrow streets, and among the quaint houses of New York.

I have already informed my readers that when the German palatines were sent to England from the camp of the Duke of Marlborough, a considerable number of them were dispatched at Government cost, to the colonies of North America.

Many of these earliest of the German exiles had come from the same district, and even from the same town or village from which the Rechels, the Hecks, the Schweitzers, themselves had sprung. Some of them were relatives of a distant degree; and all of them were countrymen and co-religionists. By this means our travelers were able to find provisional shelter; and they and their belongings were housed with some degree of comfort until they had time to look about them.

Paul and Barbara Heck, and Philip Embury and his wife Mary, found a temporary home in the house of a Dutch merchant, Jan Stuyvesant by name. He had married the descendant of a Bohemian follower of John Huss, who, like that illustrious martyr, had suffered at the stake for conscience sake. In this way Jan Stuyvesant had become linked in blood and sympathy as well as faith with the Palatine emigrants who had just arrived.

Jan's heart was as burly as his body, which is saying much; and Lisbeth, his wife, was in all things except his girth, his better half, which is saying more. Better still, as an all too rare accompaniment of these rare couplings of excellence, Lisbeth was kind and genial; she had broad and homely features which characterize her race; a class of face which is uncapable of wearing an indifferent, stern, and even forbidding aspect; but which when it is pervaded with sunshine, it is sunny indeed, and is endowed with a beauty that the fine arts cannot supply. That sunshine Lisbeth Stuyvesant wore, and it was seldom clouded, a sudshine all the more lovesome that it was kindled at the heart.

Philip Embury, wishing to gain time for the prudent selection of a plot of land, hired himself to till the ground of a German kinsman, and to secure a preparatory training in the style of farming fitted for that soil and clime; and Lucky Mike found abundant employment.

Paul Heck found abundant and remunerative employment as a carpenter, and, by his diligence and skill, seemed likely enough to swell his little hoard of savings in such wise as to bring within, not distant reach, a freehold farm of his own. The rest of our little band of Palatine pilgrims also were speedily located in the colony, some in New York itself and its immediate neighborhood, and others, with more money in their pouch, on lands purchased from Government, in more distant localities, but within reach of the central supplies and markets of the city.

Then there began for our adventurers a period of hard toil, a continuous experience of chance and change, and for a while, until crops were gathered, climate changes overcome, and the first stress of emigrant effort struggled through, they had a hard time of it. The cost of "necessaries" was heavy, and necessaries themselves were scarce.

In this way, some four or five years passed by and then the hearts of the Palatines were cheered; and their flagging faith was stimulated by the arrival of a new batch of relatives, neighbors and compatriots from Palatine. Peter Schweitzer who had come from his outlying "Concession" to do his marketing in New York, happened to have business on the wooden quay, on which he had set foot five years ago. He had one of his stalwart lads beside him, both of them sun-browned and swarthy; both of them wearing the rough, broad-brimmed straw hat, the rough, woolen, guernsey-like shirt and stout corduroy, or fustian nether garments of the Colonial farmer, and both of them bearing on their faces the witness of the rigor of their daily toil.

They were seated on the front bar of a rude wagon, of clumsy make and lumbering dimensions, to which two oxen were harnessed. Near them was a pile of bags, which, doubtless, contained some "necessaries" waiting transference to "Ballypeter," as Schweitzer's farm was called.

The two sat there thinking silently and seriously, though not sadly, for things were going well with Peter; thinking of Ballygarane: thinking also of that strange voyage. Peter's eyes were fixed on a "sail," which was ploughing its way with speed across the bay. His eye caught sight of the brown, canvas, rounded by the favoring breeze, of the oddly shapen lines of the hull beneath.

"Laddie!" he shouted, as he slapped his son on the shoulder, "That's the Colleen Bawn, as sure as there's fish in the Shannon, or frogs in the marshes of Ballygran." A few more minutes were spent in watching the approaching schooner; then Peter jumped from the wagon at a bound, and exclaimed:

"That's Captain O'Connor!" and, running to the outermost edge of the pier, he put his hand to his lips by way of speaking-trumpet, and shouted: "Is it Captain O'Connor?"

"It is—on me honor," responded the bluff voice of the genial captain.

All his love for auld langsyne was on Peter's lips as he waved his old straw hat above his head and cried:

"Hoch! Hoch! Hoch! Good luck to the Colleen Bawn."

Scarcely had the little vessel dropped anchor by the quay than Peter's hands were seized by his own brother David. He was followed by Jacob Rechel, youngest brother of Barbara Heck, and he by many another playmate, comrade, neighbor, relative and friend.

"Why, all Ballygran must be coming over!" said the delighted Peter.

"'Tis like enough," said John Lawrence, a fine, hardy, intelligent young fellow, part farmer, part artizan, whom Peter Schweitzer well remembered as a class-mate in Philip Embury's Methodist class-meeting in the city of Limerick; "It's like enough, brother Schweitzer, if the times don't mend. Mend, indeed, sure they're growin' harder an' worse instead of better. But how is it with you, brother? Where do you meet in class, and how do you fare for the means of grace?

The hot blushes forced their way through all the tan that browned the cheeks of Peter Schweitzer, and his head dropped in conscious shame. He felt then how far himself and others had gone from the "old ways;" how far distant they had allowed themselves to drift from the "first love" which turned Ballygarane, with all its poverty, into a land of Beulah, and their little homesteads in the Palatine into "a place of much delight!"

"We have no class-meeting at Ballypeter, John; indeed, there are none in New York. There is no Methodism in this country. What of the English church there is is dead and dry as the bark of a stricken tree; and of other worship there is none, or none that is not in the same evil case. Besides," continued he, speaking more boldly, as self excuse is apt to do, "there's no time here for religious exercises. It's hard work here, I promise you; and the 'twelve hours' of the Irish working-day have grown to a good eighteen, and——"

"That'll do, brother," said plain-spoken John Lawrence, with much sadness and some sarcasm in his voice; "there is little need to excuse such backsliding, seeing that in this brave young land of plenty, there is no need of God!"

Here the brief conversation ended. Peter was glad to be able to direct the new-comers to the warehouse of Peter Stuyvesant, who as a leading paymaster, had official authority to look to the early wants of fresh colonizers, and hearty goodwill toward all. Then Peter returned to his boy and his oxen, not to laden his wagon and depart, but to quarter them and himself in the queer straggling old hostelry, know as the 'King's Arms,' and kept by that redoubtable supporter of King George III, and royalty in general, George King.

Both Peter and the "laddie" found it more than they could do to turn their backs at once on all these new arrivals and on all the possible news they had brought along with them, even though it were to turn their faces toward home. But whether in the hotel or at home, Peter was bound to carry with him a sorely troubled conscience, so sharply wounded was he with the arrow, which had been shot from a bow drawn at a venture from honest John Lawrence's unconscious hand.

John Lawrence had, in truth, hit upon the great blot in the behavior of our Irish Palatines in their new home beyond the sea. By far the most of them had left their Methodism behind them; and, very naturally, seeing that they had found nothing in its stead, their religious profession followed suit; and so in turn, it is greatly to be feared, its possession, unsustained by the "communion of saints," dwindled out. Only a few, a very few, still held to the faith—notably, Barbara Heck and her husband, and Philip Embury and his young wife

But although the pressure of time and toil furnished the Palatines with many excuses for neglecting religious worship, it provided them them with abundant reasons for social gatherings, pleasant merry-makings, and pastimes at each other's houses, and at the cozy old hostel kept by the Englishman, George King.

Such a gathering was being held in the "King George," when Peter Schweitzer and his promising boy took ud their lodgings in the inn to hear the news of the "Ould Country." Nothing would serve the old friends and acquaintances whom he met there, but that he must "take a hand" with them and "take a cup of kindness for the days of auld lang syne."

But what could he do? He could not be churlish in such company, for he was glad to see them, and there was no mistaking the pleasure they felt in seeing him. Besides, he and his boy would both be away again in a day or two, and uo harm would be done. So the old, old, and still new, excuses for giving way, wrought their accustomed will on him and Peter Schweitzer became hail-fellow-well-met with the party round the table.

Impulsive Peter had just seated himself with his glass when the door opened, and in walked none other than his sister, Barbara! If they had been pressed to guess whose hand was laid upon the latch before the door was opened, never a soul among them would have thought of Barbara Heck. Her presence there was as if a thunderbolt had fallen. Her tall form, her stately mien, her striking face and features, the frown upon her brow, the working of her lips that told of suppressed emotion, her extended finger pointing to the glasses on the table, all united to impress them into silence. It was as if a prophetess stood before them! All brave Barbara's soul seemed to be alight in those blue eyes!

For a full minute this tableau remained fixed, intense; and then Barbara, turning to the bewildered groups at the table, said, in tones of deepest feeling:

"May the great God forgive your sin and folly! What! Will you crucify your Lord afresh, and put him to an open shame? His first disciples forsook him and fled, and thereby filled their souls with coward guilt; but ye, more vile than they, have not only fled from him, but towards the devil for whom you sold him!"

At this point, the heroic element in Barbara's character suddenly failed her, and the true womanly asserted itself. And yet I know not whether the tears and pleadings that followed were not equally heroic in their desperate resolve to stand in the breach for good and all. Brave Barbara's voice trembled; she gasped for breath; the big drops coursed down her cheeks in quick succession, and then with her heart upon her lips, she entreated for her Saviour and for them. Laying her hands lovingly on the shoulders of her old friend and neighbor, Peter Schweitzer—it was he whom she had come to the King George to greet, for the sake of the older days—she said:

"Peter, do you not remember the little class room in the meeting-house at Limerick, and the means of grace that came to us like breezes from Zion's Hill? That was the gate of heaven. But, what is this? Think you it was for this that the Lord brought us over the deep and wide sea holding us in the hollow of his hand?"

"Amen, Barbara!" cried Peter Schweitzer, unable any longer to stand the barbed arrows which had joined with John Lawrence's pioneer dart to distress the soul within him. His boy, too, his young heart taken captive by the valiant defender of the faith, whom he had known and loved aforetime, came forward from his seat in the chimney corner, and half unconsciously laid his hand on his father's arm.

"Let us go away, father, said he, "you and I have no business here."

Barbara had not noticed the presence of the youth hitherto, but now she greeted him with a winsome smile, bent forward to kiss her young kinsman, saying:

"Thou art right, David, neither thou, nor I; nor hath the rest of us any business here. Up, men!" she said, in commanding tones, and speaking to the whole group. "Arise, for we on whom the light hath shined must be about our Master's business?"

Peter Schweitzer rose from the seat he had previously taken, saying, seriously and sadly; "You are right, Barbara. David, my son, you have said truly, 'We have no business here.'"

Peter Rechel, too, followed suit, and with the facility with which his moods changed under the influence of feeling, he left the table saying:

"Right. God bless her! She is always right. And we—" And then Peter wept.

Little more was said, for again a great silence fell upon them; one by one the company dispersed. Some few were not so greatly convicted as others, but all were moved, and the bold action of Brave Barbara was fated with results which are still pulsing in wide and even world-spread power for good at this day.

A Christian Hero.

JOHN HALYDAY GORDON, in the terrible calamity that visited Oil City, Pa., June 5th, 1892, saved forty-one lives. He resides at Siverlyville, a village one mile above Oil City. He is thirty-nine years of age, married, in humble circumstances, with a family of eight children, the oldest not yet grown to womanhood, depending on him for support.

That fatal Sunday, Mr. Gordon heard of the threatened danger to life, in consequence of the rising of the water in Oil Creek, caused by the incessant rains, followed by a cloud burst. Taking a small boat, he hastened to the scene of the terrible disaster. Sounds of alarm had been given, cries of help were heard upon every side. "Help, help, for the love of God!" he heard all about him. With wonderful presence of mind, he commenced his noble work of rescue. With his small boat he faced the angry flood, which came down Oil Creek valley in a mighty torrent, carrying death and destruction in its path. Houses were moved from their foundations and floated about like toys upon the water. Men, women and children were clinging to trees, window ledges, and fences, calling piteously for help. Seven times Gordon's little boat went through the submerged streets, returning each time with a freight of human beings, which he landed in places of safety.

Superhuman were his efforts whilst wrestling with the deluge, but he pursued his course with unflinching determination, rescuing the helpless. At last he felt the end had come, and as the thought of his wife and little ones flashed before him, he prayed earnestly to God to spare his life for their dear sakes.

Nearer, nearer, came the fiery flood, devouring everything in its path. Gordon plunged into the water, diving down to prevent being roasted by the burning mass. Twice he came to the surface for air, which resulted in the burning of his face and hands. The third time that he reached the top of the water, he was able to make his escape to the shore, and was saved from the river of fire.

When he was out of danger, he was so dazed that it seemed to him that he had been the victim of a terrible nightmare, and he could hardly realize that he was standing there alive. It was some moments before he could convince himself of the fact. Nearly overcome with fatigue, suffering torture from the burns he had received, he tried to reach the home of his relatives in the town, and was soon fortunate enough to meet a friend who assisted him to find them.

Mr. Gordon who is a thorough Christian, is modest, and in speaking of the work that he did, said, "I was in God's hands, his instrument; he had work for me to do and I did it, with his help the best I could. I ask no praise, and I desire no earthly reward."

Forty-one human beings, most of whom were women and children, owe their lives to this hero. Mr. Gordon has so far recovered from his burns as to be able to resume his employment.

1,000 ROOMS IN PRIVATE HOUSES

Which may be rented by respectable people during all or part of the World's Fair period. This will be a glad boon to Christain people everywhere—especially those whose limited circumstances do not allow them to go to the high priced hotels, or who are afraid to trust themselves to the cheap structures which have lately been built. These PRIVATE ROOMS, however, are (almost without exception) in Christian homes, belonging to people in great part who read The Ram's Horn. Exact information regarding location, description and rates will be furnished by The Ram's Horn, Correspondence with reference to engaging rooms will be carried on between the parties directly interested.

This will prove HAPPY TIDINGS to those who desire to see the Great Fair but who stagger at the thought of landing as a stranger (at night, perhaps) in a city of one and a half million inhabitants.

To all such, the above privileges can scarcely be over-estimated, and it will seem almost a paradox when you are told that they will NOT COST YOU ONE PENNY. Of course, they will cost THE RAM'S HORN a great deal, and, of course, we must enforce some easy but practical condition in order to escape imposition from the unworthy. We infer that only RESPECTABLE people would care to read a religious paper, so we will only require that your name be among Ram's Horn subscribers, and in order to make the condition still more easy the paper will be sent you FROM NOW TILL JANUARY, 1894, FOR ONLY $1.00.

What is The Ram's Horn?

It is a religious paper for everybody; for busy people especially; for you in particular.
It is for religion, as against religions. Not for sect, but for souls.
It has no church news, but tells all about how to get to heaven.
It has a good deal of sunshine, cheer and reverence.
It has often whole sermons in a sentence.
It has FRIENDS. For instance:

D. L. Moody, the Evangelist: I like your paper. May God bless and prosper it.

D. L. Moody.

Francis E. Willard, Evanston, Ill.: It rolls forth a clear-toned rally note for the militant army of our Lord.

Frances E. Willard.

Cut out this blank (or copy it exactly) and send to us AT ONCE with $1.00 enclosed. You will get THE RAM'S HORN for almost a year and a certificate securing you all privileges in the World's Fair Bureau as above described.

I enclose $1.00 for which send me The Ram's Horn, until, January, 1894, and mail me, at once, a certificate entitling me to information and privileges, free of charge, in your World's Fair Bureau, as advertised in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Questions & Answers

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Many subscribers have written asking what Scriptural authority there is for the observance of Sunday. We have nothing to add to the answer given on the subject in our issue of Jan. 4, to Sid. J. Hare.

L. G. Curtis, Alexandria, Mo. Who was David's mother?

Her name is nowhere stated in the Bible.

Subscriber, New Windsor, Ill. What is President Cleveland's religious denomination?

He is a Presbyterian.

Subscriber, New York. Where in the Bible is there any statement that Jesus authorized any beside the twelve to eat of the bread and drink of the cup at the Holy Communion?

Paul says (1. Cor. 11. 23), that he had received a special message from the Lord on the subject and this message which is given in the following verses implies general participation.

Subscriber, Gainesville, Tex. Is there any proof in the Bible that men are fallen angels who have been cast out of heaven?

None whatever. You will see by referring to Jude 6 and other passages in which fallen angels are mentioned that they differ from men in order, origin and destiny.

J. R. Armstrong, Newman, Cal. 1. Is the equality of the three persons of the Trinity anywhere stated in the Bible? 2. Did Christ say anywhere that he was God?

1. The clearest and most explicit statement is in 1. John 5: 7. 2. Christ's answer to the High Priest (Matt. 26: 63, 64), "Thou hast said" was the customary mode of affirmation.

Flavia V. Loop, Savannah, Ill. What was the height and width of the wall around Jerusalem?

A fragment which is supposed to be part of the original wall still remains near the town of David. It is seven feet thick. The height varied with the level of the ground. It is believed to have varied from twenty feet on the high ground to forty feet on the low.

Reader, Niagara Falls, N. Y. Why are ministers given the title of "reverend"?

It is a title which, for many centuries has been prefixed by courtesy to the names of ordained preachers. In the Anglican, Protestant and Roman churches, the title is given to ecclesiastics of the second and third orders, the bishops being styled "right reverend." The expression doubtless originated in an intention to describe the attitude and demeanor of ministers in sacred things.

J. N. Gay, Folkston, Ga. What gives Easter Sunday its name?

Easter is a word of Saxon origin and originally related to a goddess of the Saxons, Estera, to whom sacrifices were offered annually about Passover time. When Christianity supplanted the heathen observances, the Christian festival of the resurrection happening at Passover time, the old appellation of Easter was still retained; hence we even yet say Easter-day and Easter-Sunday, though improperly.

Jane McComber, Pearl, Vt. When was the Ark of the Covenant destroyed?

There are various conjectures about the final disposition of the Ark. One supposes that when the Temple was plundered and demolished by the Babylonians, it was taken away and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. It was worth about $2,500,000, the estimated value of the gold of which it was composed. Another conjecture, which the Jews believe to be the true one, is that the priests hid it in some cavern of the mountains where it is still concealed, and that it will be ultimately revealed when the Messiah comes.

Mrs. M. B. Cook, Ill. 1. Was Christ's temptation after his baptism, to accept the proffered temporal kingdom? If not, what is more reasonable? 2. Was the pinnacle of the Temple figurative of temporal honor? 3. The wilderness, is it not [illegible] ? 4. Was he tempted in all points as other men? 5. [illegible] him? 6. Was it possible for Christ to renounce his redemptive work? 7. If man is brought in[illegible] by the indwelling Spirit of God, is this not the mystery of the Trinity? 8. Can you inform me where I can get a book: title, "The Great Temptation?"

1. The temptation is more or less of a mystery to every one. We have no information, of course, but the Bible narrative. It would appear, however, that at the outset of his work, Christ retired to the desert to prepare for it. There the temptation was presented to him of securing the kingdom by means which appeared to him equivalent to an act of homage to Satan. If you can imagine a church desiring [illegible] opening a saloon or a gambling resort to get [illegible] the principle of that particular temptation of Christ.—2. The pinnacle of the Temple was probably a genuine temptation. Christ had fallen into depression after his long fast and mental conflict. He was tempted to doubt his sonship. The suggestion was made to him to test it by placing himself in peril of his life. If he threw himself down and no harm came to him, then he would know that God had owned him as his son. Christ put the temptation from him with a quotation as before.—3. It may be, but more probably it was the literal desert.—4. You have the Scriptural statement to that effect. (Heb. 4: 15.)—5. The account of the temptation represents Satan as asking for worship, not service.—6. We cannot conceive of his doing so. We cannot answer as to the possibility of an inconceivable thing.—7. The mystery of the Trinity is the relation of the three Beings composing it. We cannot see how there can be any connection between the two points you mention.—8. No. A bookseller could probably tell you.—9. The one was necessary to the other. He came to reveal God to men and his death was the culmination of the redemptive work.—10. We know nothing about Adam and Eve, except what is told us in the Bible. So far as we understand the narrative, there is nothing in it to indicate that they were angels. The Bible says, "a man and a woman."

Mrs. E. H. Bayley, Ruthven, Ia. and "Theodosia," Carbon, Col. Write to librarian, Astor Library, New York City.—C. McC. Baltimore, Md. Yes.—Regular Reader, E. St. Louis, Ill. Those born here, but of African descent, are Afro-Americans. All belong to the negro race and may be properly so classified.—L. A. Spencer, Fernandina, Fla. Thanks for information.—John A. Bader, Sea Cliff, N. Y. "There are father and mother in the room," is right.—M. S. Brown, Conewango, N. Y. Mr. Moody's address is Northfield, Mass.—S. A. Moore, Columbus Grove, Pa. 1. It will, in due time. 2. Send 25 cents and the [illegible] will be forwarded.—B. F. Brown, Piatt, Ill. In the Greek Church only.—D. C. Reed, Eureka Mills, Cal. We have no news regarding the Sessions family.—J. C. L., Jacksonville, Ill. An encyclopedia will give the desired information.—Nellie Patch, Kirkwood, Ill.—Oliver T. Barnes, Hopeton, Va. Yes; there is no pardon without repentance. There should be restitution also when that is possible.—Ed. Hartley, Kennard, Ind. 1. Christ wished to show his identity with the race in complying with the law and the ordinances. 2. In those days women were in subjection and to have spoken in the Church would have been to bring upon them the charge of immodesty. There is difference of opinion as to whether the prohibition was intended to be in force perpetually. Probably not. 3. The fundamental unity for which Paul longed as Jesus did. Paul was probably referring to some trouble such as he describes in 1. Corinthians 1: 14. 4. Not exactly as you quote. You will find such expressions in the following passages: Deut. 32: 30; John 16: 24; Rom. 3: 23, 24.—E. R. S., New York. We limit the number of fish because John who was present says that there were 153. See John 21: 11.—Reader, Springdale, Pa. Send your name and address to William F. A Great Philanthropic Gift.

The Armour Institute in Chicago and its Value to Young Men.

CHICAGO has long needed some such institution as the Cooper Union in New York, and Mr. Armour, the millionaire philanthropist, recognizing this, sometime ago devoted a portion of his great wealth to this purpose. The result has been the foundation of a magnificent temple of education to be known as the Armour Institute, and which will be a rich boon to the youth of Chicago, as it represents a new movement in education.

The organization of the Institute is unique' and is briefly explained in the Boy's Brigade Courier. Its management consists of the president and the associated council, the faculty and the board of instruction. Its school organization centres about a scientific academy. In this academy, for the first year, there will be only one regular course. The requirements for admission will be as high as those of the best public high schools. It will be opened to both boys and girls above the age of fourteen. About this academy, in striking similarity to the organization of the finest universities, are grouped various schools. For the first year there will be a school of English, a school of Librarians, school of Mathematics, a school of Chemistry, a school of Electricity, a school of Mechanical Engineering, a school of Physics, a school of American History and Politics, a school of Domestic Sciences, a Kindergarten College, and a school of Fine Arts, Mechanical Drawing and Architecture.

THE ARMOUR INSTITUTE, CHICAGO.

The present buildings of the Institute are located three miles south of the business centre of Chicago, in a district central for the uniting of rich and poor in social and educational enterprises. The lower floor of the Armour Mission building is given to the Kindergarten College; the other departments of the Institute are in in the new building, which was erected in 1891, and is located adjacent to the main building. The equipment of the building is now being made. Many of the best exhibits of the World's Fair will be put into the Institute as equipment. The Library will contain by September 1, ten thousand choice newly-purchased volumes.

The faculty of the Institute has been very carefully chosen from the best material possible. Prof. Frank W. Gunsaulus is President and each of the associate professors is a specialist in his line. Rev. Charles T. Wyckoff is the pastor of the Institution.

ALMOST PERSUADED.

IN the course of a missionary tour of two months in India, the Rev. Elbert Chute, the Baptist missionary of Palmur, was visited by a Brahmin who declared himself a convert to Christianity and asked for baptism. Mr. Chute says: While examining him as to his Christian experience, we asked him if he was willing to take off his caste thread and the religious mark on his forehead. He said that he would do so. One of his friends then said:

"If you do that, your friends will cast you out of their caste, and your own family will not eat with you or even allow you to come into your own house."

"I know it," he said, "but salvation is of more value than all of these things."

"But you have a grant of land from the Gudwall king, the rent of which brings you five hundred rupees annually. This he will take from you if you became a Christian, will he not?"

He answered, "Yes, but I will let that go also. Salvation is worth more than that."

One of the men said: "But what will your son say if you let all of his property go by becoming a Christian?"

He hesitated again. A man sitting near suggested that he should make his property over to his son and then take baptism. I protested against this, and told him he would then put his son under the same temptation from which he now finds it so difficult to escape. I exhorted him earnestly to follow the Saviour at once. But it was unavailing; for he said, "I will first secure my property and then I will receive baptism." I exhorted him to remain firm in the faith and not be deceived again by the Brahmins. He replied that he was firmly believing, and that no one could deceive him. He left us, and I heard no more from him until the evening of the next day, when a man came, bringing the books that I had given him, and said that he had sent them back to us and did not want them. It seemed that the Brahmins had been persuading him during the last twenty-four hours not to become a Christian, and in his weakness they had prevailed. We felt very sorrowful about it, for he seemed sincere and was about ready to take the last step into the kingdom; yet he failed. We are forcibly reminded of the words of our Saviour, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven."

EVENING THOUGHTS.

I sat by the western window
At the close of a summer's day;
Before me the dewy meadow,
And wooded hillside lay.

The sun was slowly setting,
Filling the land with light,
As if to the sad though beautiful world
It were loth to bid good night.

And, I thought of the Holy City
Which the spirit revealed to John,
Whose glory was like the glory of God,
And its light like a precious stone.

And I drew for myself a picture
In that changing western sky,
Of the city which John, on Patmos Isle,
Saw descending from on high.

And as I looked, I pondered;
A reed of golden light,
Seemed like the reed of the angel
To measure the city's height.

And I thought of the power and goodness
Of the Maker and Giver of all,
Who into our lives lets the sunshine
As well as the shadows fall.

CHOOSING A PROFESSION.*

THERE are countless reasons against your boy becoming a clergyman merely because he has found other avenues closed to him. But there is no reason whatever why this profession should not be suggested to him at sixteen as one of the alternatives, supposing, of course, you see that he has an honest and good heart. There are many lads in the country quite well fitted to prepare for holy orders, as far as disposition goes, who yet do not give the matter a thought, simply because their parents have shrunk from suggesting such a course to them, for fear of forcing them. It sounds plausible enough to leave them to make their own choice, and not to bias them, and so forth; but if you talk other professions and never mention this one, you are biassing them against it. The fairest thing to do is to bring the matter before the boys at the right age, and explain what the clerical profession means, just as you would explain what colonial life means. It is impossible that they should know the truth about one any more than the other, unless some one tells them. If you are inclined to make much of the need of a call from God before a boy can decide on such a point, remember that the call may come through you quite as easy and as truly as through any other channel. If, on the other hand, you are inclined to be influenced by mundane considerations, and to feel that though the work of a clergyman's life is good, yet the pay is miserable, I would remind you that unless you do something, such as I have suggested, your boy may soon find himself without either work or pay. There must be scores of young barristers, doctors, architects, etc., in this plight. The uncertainty of a curate ever being able to support a family is felt by many parents to be an objection to the profession; but such as it is, it applies to others, too.

THE MULTIPLYING POWER.†

"BRING them hither to me." The blessings of Jesus was that which converted a handful of provision into a plenteous feast. Need it be said that it is ever so with the Gospel. The servant, the worker, the preacher, does his best, if he is earnest; and then, if he is wise, he counts it nothing, and less than nothing, without the Master's blessing. The most elaborate human effort is utterly useless and powerless in divine things, simply as human effort. Eminently does this apply to the labor of the Gospel ministry. If we were asked to select from literature the acme of effort in that kind, we should without hesitation fix upon the court preaching of Louis XIV's time in France. In that depraved court, amid intense profession of religion, there were such preachers (Bossuet, Bourdalone, Massillon) as have never since the days of the Apostles been surpassed for impassioned vehemence and power of oratory. The preachers were pious, evangelical, intensely in earnest. Admiring crowds gathered around them. The result in France, in Paris, in those royal and noble circles, was nothing. It was perhaps the most useless and ineffectual preaching that ever dropped from human lips.

On the other hand, how often has the Master blessed most largely and sovereignly the plain efforts of plain, humble, and earnest men! How often has he been pleased to use of the labors of his trained and accomplished workers even those parts that were to themselves the least pleasing or comfortable! It is a necessary balance to that other necessity for our utmost and conscientious all. In this (as in most) success is skill—the success of turning many to righteousness. He that "winneth souls" is the "wise" worker. And doubtless those who aim at this persistently, painstakingly, will win and wear the crown. But for us all, both that speak and hear, the prime requisite is to comply with the injunction of our Lord about the loaves: "Bring them hither to me." Let us get our spiritual provision passed under the Master's blessing hand. Let us neither give nor take what has not first gone round by the head of the table. If all our utterances only went from the study to the pulpit, to the class-room, to the preacher's desk by way of the mercy-throne, and then came from us to the pew through another cloud of the incense of the hearers' prayers, we should doubtless have pentecostal days of the Gospel's power.

"TRAILING QUEEN"

FUCHSIA, TRAILING QUEEN.

This new Fuchsia is the most fascinatingly beautiful of all new plants. Instead of growing erect, its branches are vine-like and trail down over the sides of the pot or basket to a length of two or three feet. The flowers are of enormous size, buds, tubes and sepals being intense scarlet, while the corolla is a deep rich purple, changing to a fine crimson—flowers of both colors showing on a plant to great advantage. Plants bloom all the time, both summer and winter, and frequently show hundreds of flowers at once in enormous drooping clusters. It is the easiest of all plants to grow, as it thrives in any soil or situation. It is the most beautiful window plant we have. IN SUNNY CALABRIA.*

AS you trudge up the stony mile-track through the green valley, it strikes you that after all it is easier to walk from Diamante all this way to Verbicaro, than to face a March storm in the gulf of Salerno in an open boat on a dark night. Up you go, past that strange ruin of the great Norman-Saracen castle standing alone on the steep little hill which rises out of the middle of the valley, commanding the roads on the right and the left. You have heard of the Saracens, but not of the Normans. What kind of people lived there amongst those bristling ivy-grown towers? Thieves, of course. Were they not Saracens and therefore Turks, according to your ethnology and therefore brigands? It is odd that the government should have allowed them to build a castle just there. Perhaps they were stronger than the government. You have never heard of Count Roger, either, though you know the story of Judas Iscariot by heart as you have heard it told many times in Scalea. Up you go, leaving the castle behind you, up to that square house they call the tower, on the brow of the hill. It is a lonely road, a mere sheep-track over the heights. You are over it at last, and that is Verbicaro, over there on the other side of the great valley, perched against the mountain side, a rough, grey mass of red-roofed houses, cropping out like red-tipped rocks out of a vast, sloping vineyard. And now there are people on the road, slender, bare-footed, brown women in dark, wine-colored woolen skirts and scarlet cloth bodices, much the worse for wear, treading lightly under half a quintal of grapes; well-to-do peasant men—galantuomini, they are called in Calabria—driving laden mules before them, their dark-blue jackets flung upon one shoulder. Out at last, by the little chapel, upon what is the beginning of an inland carriage road—in a land where even the one-wheeled wheel-barrow has never been seen.

And now you are in the town. The streets are paved, but Verbicaro is not Naples, not Salermo, not even Amalfi. The pavement is of the roughest cobblestones, and the pigs are the scavengers. Pigs everywhere, black, and happy. Red-skirted, scarlet-bodiced women, too, all moving and carrying something. Galantuomini loafing at most of the corners, aud the shopkeeper's nose just visible from a distance, as he stands in the door of his dingy den. Dirtier and dirtier grow the cobblestones as you go on. Brighter and brighter the huge bunches of red peppers fastened by every window, thicker and thicker on the walls and shaky balconies the black melons and yellowish grey cantalopes, hung up to keep in the high, fresh air, each slung in a hitch of yarn to a nail of its own.

Here and there some one greets you. What have you to sell? Will you take a cargo of pears? Good this year, like all the fruit. The figs and grapes will not be dry for another month. They nod and move on, as you pass by them. Verbicaro is a commercial centre, in spite of the pigs.

THE GOOD-NATURED PASSENGER.†

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE describes in his fragment of autobiography a journey from Massachusetts to Kentucky in the days before the railroad. He noticed, he says, that the tone of a stage coach party often depended upon the temper of a single individual. A cross, ill-natured, complaining fellow would make all the other passengers cross, ill-natured, and complaining. "Once," he says, "when going through the Cattaraugus woods, where the road was mostly deep mire or rough corduroy and there was every temptation to be cross or uncomfortable, one man so enlivened and entertained our party, and was so accommodating and good-natured that we seemed to be having a pleasant picnic, and the other inmates of the coach took the same tone. I therefore found it best for my own sake, as soon as we took our places in the coach for a long journey, to manifest an interest in my fellow-passengers and their comforts; offering, for example, to change places with them if they preferred my seat to their own, and paying them such little attentions as are always agreeable. It happened almost always that the other passengers would follow this lead, and take pains to be civil and accommodating." Is not that a parable of human life? Widen out a stage-coach and you get a neighborhood. And set down one individual in that neighborhood who tries a good many times a day to do what Christ says, and you get a glimpse of the millennium.

The Helpers of the Poor.

One of the most helpful people I know in Pittsburg lives in a back street, in an unpleasant neighborhood, in a small house. Everybody in that neighborhood knows her, and she knows them and their children. They go to her with their troubles and she gives them her sympathy. As for money, she would give them, too, if she had any to give. She gives herself. The whole street is better because she lives on it. But if she had the means which some have, what would she do I wonder? Would she fall before the temptation of a comfortable life? Would she get, perhaps, to thinking that because she had plenty of butter on her bread so had everybody else? and because she was contented, all the mutterings of discontented people were but needless grumblings? Anyhow, it is true that the kindest, most thoughtful, most helpful people, quickest to bear the hardest inconveniences for a neighbor, readiest to lift up those that are down, are the poor.

THE ROYAL ROAD.

ONE morn when we had lifted up a prayer,
Which should for that day's need bring help to guide,
A little one rose up with thoughtful air [side:
From where he had been kneeling at my
"Mamma," he said, with rev'rent speech and low,
Yet glad of heart the precious truth to seize,
"Mamma, I know that God is very high,
But papa always climbs there on his knees."

Could each sad soul thus count its access sure
Made so by love that died to give it ease,
'Twould find by Calvary the upward path,
Nor seek the steeps of Sinai on its knees.

When our endeavors reach the shining goal,
We shall with backward glance our way retrace,
To find we climbed there on our bended knees,
Uplifted and upheld by constant grace.

Sunday in the Boston Tombs.

How the Prisoners in the Cells are Visited and Pointed to the Sinners' Friend—A Wife's Message—A Tenor Singer in Trouble

CHRIST-LIKE work which is but little known, has been going on for some six years past in the city prison of Boston, Mass. Perhaps some account of it may lead Christian young men in other cities to undertake a similar work in the prisons to which they may have access. It appears that in the year 1886 some members of the Young Men's Christian Association learned that on Sundays there were often a number of men in the cells of the prison, who had been arrested on Saturday and were kept there all day to await the sitting of the courts on Monday. No one was specially interested in their moral and spiritual welfare, and it occurred to the young men that if they were visited, it might be that some of them would be in a susceptible mood and could be reached with Christian influence. It was determined to make the experiment and a permit to visit the Tombs was obtained. From that day to this, the weekly visits have been made and from time to time the Christian young men have been encouraged by knowing that God has blessed their labors in this unpromising field.

The plan adopted is to hold a short service in the corridor on which the grated doors of the cells open, to sing some old melodies, offer prayers for the forgiveness of the wrongdoers and then in simple plain language declare the Gospel message and give to the penitent the assurance of God's pardon through Christ. Special emphasis is always given to the fact that Christ particularly invited sinners to come to him and that none, however despairing they might feel, or however crushed by the disgrace that had fallen upon them, would be excluded if they came humbly to God asking him for Christ's sake to forgive them.

After the service, the young men go from one grated door to another and talk with the inmates of the cells. Very sad and pitiful are the stories they often hear from the unhappy men. On one occasion a man looking through the bars told how he had come to Boston on business from a country town. There he was a respectable man, attending the Methodist church regularly and of good moral character. But being in the city among strangers he was induced to take a glass of liquor before returning home. He was not apprehensive of danger, but before he realized his condition, he was helplessly intoxicated and did not recover his senses until he was a prisoner in the Tombs. He wept bitterly as he thought of his wife and family, who doubtless were anxiously waiting his coming and were distressed by the delay.

[illegible] cases met with in the cells are those in which the prisoner attributes his trouble directly to intoxicating liquor. A very remarkable case was one of a policeman. He was a highly respected officer in another city, who being in Boston on a visit, indulged in a few drinks with a friend. Many a drunken man in his own town had he locked up, or taken to his own residence, so that he could not plead ignorance of the results of drinking. To his horror, he found himself in custody in a strange city and was spending the Sunday in bitterly lamenting his folly. His experience, he said, would be a lesson to him all his life. He would have more sympathy with the drunkard and show him more kindness and forbearance.

A general lesson that is learned from this experience of contact with wrong-doers has been the value and power of kindness and encouragement. The wrongdoer who has been caught and imprisoned seldom needs to have the evil of his ways pointed out to him. He is, as a rule, feeling that more intensely than any one could show it to him. He is in greater need of cheer and hope. He thinks all is lost, that there is no longer any hope for him and it is no use trying to retrieve the past. He needs to be assured of God's love and the longing in the divine heart for his restoration. "It is remarkable," says Mr. Frank F. McLeod, one of the workers in this prison-visiting band, "how surely a reference to the prisoner's mother touches his heart. Would he be where he is if he had followed her counsels? How would she feel if she could see him where he is at this hour? In answer to such questions the prisoner's head droops and the tears come to his eyes. The answer almost invariably is that the mother was as good a woman as ever lived. In the softened frame of mind a promise of amendment can generally be extracted, and then we pray that God will help him to keep it."

Those prayers have often been answered. Not long ago a well-dressed man went into the office of the Boston Transcript, and asked to see Mr. Allen. When that gentleman appeared the visitor asked him if he remembered him. "No," said Mr. Allen, "I do not recollect ever meeting you before." The visitor looked at him earnestly and said, "But I remember you very well. I was a prisoner in the Tombs when I first saw you. I had been drinking and was locked up one Sunday and you and your friends came into the place. I was going fast then on the road to utter ruin. My wife had lost hope of me and I had lost hope of myself. I believed I should never be able to reform. But you pointed me to Christ and put new courage into me. I followed your advice and did not rest until I became a Christian. I am a member of the church now and have a good position in a leading clothing house in our town. When I was coming to Boston yesterday I told my wife I should come to see you and thank you and she begged me to tell you of her heart-felt gratitude and to beg you to go on with your good work."

Five similar cases are on the records of this prison-visiting band. In each case the victim of drink was on the high road to ruin, but is now living a Christian life and doing Christian work. Another remarkable instance is that of a man whom the visitors found behind the bars, one Sunday afternoon. He was charged with embezzlement, and was afterward convicted. He had been the tenor singer in a church, and had sat for years unmoved under the preaching of the Gospel. He felt his disgrace keenly, and for a long time could not be led to take heart and begin life again in the right way. Ultimately, the young men were successful in leading him to trust in Christ for salvation, and after serving his sentence they met him and helped him. He is now thoroughly reformed, and is leading a Christian life. Not always does the reformation begun in jail prove thus permanent, but the failures do not discourage workers who believe [illegible]

Sunday after Sunday this good work goes on. The sinner is pointed to the sinner's Friend, and the despairing are urged to put their trust in him who casts out none who come to him. It is a noble, Christian work, such as he will reward, who bade his servants go into the highways and hedges and invite all to his Father's house.

A SCOTTISH PEASANT'S HOME.

OUR home, writes Rev. John G. Paton, the missionary to the New Hebrides, consisted of a "butt" and a "ben" and a "mid-room," or chamber. The one end was my mother's domain, and served all the purposes of dining-room and kitchen and parlor, besides containing two large wooden erections, called by our Scotch peasantry "box beds." The other end was my father's workshop, filled with five or six "stocking frames," whirring with the constant action of five or six pairs of busy hands and feet, and producing right genuine hosiery for the merchants at Hawick and Dumfries. The mid-room was a very small apartment betwixt the other two, having room only for a bed, a little table and a chair, with a diminutive window shedding diminutive light on the scene.

This was the sanctuary of that cottage home. Thither daily, and oftentimes a day, generally after each meal, we saw our father retire, and "shut to the door"; and we children got to understand by a sort of spiritual instinct, that prayers were being poured out for us, as of old by the High Priest within the veil in the Most Holy Place. We occasionally heard the pathetic echoes of a trembling voice pleading as if for life, and we learned to slip out and in past that door on tiptoe, not to disturb the holy colloquy. The outside world might not know, but we knew, whence came that happy light of a new-born smile that was always dawning on my father's face; it was a reflection from the divine Presence, in the consciousness of which he lived.

DARKEST AFRICA.

FROM Bondango comes a thrilling description of the miseries of heathenism. Mrs. Cole who is stationed there with her husband and his colleague, Mr. Scarnell, writes: "It is fourteen months since we came here where no missionaries had yet been. I had no conception until I saw it how low and degraded human nature could become. Up to the time when the station was opened, a very brisk and persevering trade was carried on in slaves by traders from Down River. For ages this part of the country has been drained to supply hewers of wood, drawers of water, and subjects for the execution knife, for other and stronger peoples. Human sacrifice is common, and cannibalism also, except immediately near us. But recently we had tangible proof of this from a town about three miles distant. I held in my hand the jaw-bones of one poor unfortunate, on which the little flesh which remained was still moist. Shocking are the details of the discoveries we make from day to day. The inveterate and abominable superstitions which hold our people, are legion.

"It is scarcely possible to conceive the universal power exercised by the witch-doctors over the devil-blinded and unthinking minds. The cunning fellows can make the credulous people do anything, say anything, and give just what they choose to ask. No one is supposed to die a natural death; some one's 'evil spirit' somewhere must be the cause; so the witch-doctor is called to give his verdict."

OUR CROSSES.

THE life that you loved into being has fled,
The lips that you kissed into sweetness are dead,
The heart in whose pulses you counted your own,
And molded for years with a look or a tone,
Untouched by your sighing,
Unmoved by your crying,
His tasted the pain and the sweetness of dying.

You were watching unseen when the curtain was drawn
And the soul that awoke in the Heavenly dawn,
And the arm you stretched out, as he passed from your sight,
Was caught by a ray of the Heavenly light.
Very near to the door
Do we stand in the hour,
When our children pass by us, and enter before.

Ah! we may be purer—but think of the years
When we shaped them with love, and baptized them in tears—
They who should live after to conquer our pain,
And recover our losses by aid of our gain,
And wiser and younger,
And better and stronger,
Take the burden of life when we bear it no longer.

To wear all our virtues, like jewels reset;
To redeem all our failures, our errors forget;
And step from our shoulders to heights more sublime,
Than ever our feet have been able to climb—
What sorrows we wear!
What crosses we bear!
When they leave us alone in the valley of prayer.

But his soul was unstained, and his record all pure—
"Would you lay your cross on him" to do and endure?
Though he stood in the line of promotion unscarred,
Would you stay "his commission" that comes from the Lord?
With nothing for fears,
Is there matter for tears
That for him is bridged over the anguish of years?

Oh! stretch out your arms o'er the grave and the sod,
And lay what you have on the bosom of God.
Draw nearer, and nearer, the veil is so thin
Love makes it transparent, and gazes within.
Love hath no denials,
Its crosses and trials
Mark ages of bliss on its Heavenly dials.

We are glad when our babes come safely to earth,
Through the perils, and pangs, and the rapture of birth;
As we felt in the hour when they opened their eyes,
Let us feel when again they are born in the skies.
And year after year!
Draw near and more near!
Till Heaven may be seen through the lens of a tear!

★ The Resurrection of Lazarus ✠

The Traditional Tomb of the Brother of Mary and Martha at Bethany.

OF all the miracles performed by the Saviour, none have excited such universal wonder and controversy as "the three raisings from the dead." Three evangelists tell the story of the raising of the young daughter of Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue at Capernaum. Luke, the most circumstantial of the Apostles, relates in detail the wondrous incident of the restoration of the widow's son in the public thoroughfare and in the presence of a multitude of mourners and sight-seers from both Nain and Capernaum, who crowded about the bier. Unquestionably those two miracles, more than all that had preceded them, drew popular attention to Christ's mission and doctrine, and simultaneously awoke the bitterest hatred of the Sanhedrim. It needed but a crowning incident to urge his enemies to act, and this was furnished in the raising of Lazarus, the last and greatest of the resurrection miracles. At the home of the two sisters, Mary and Martha, (who kept house for Lazarus, their brother, at Bethany, a beautiful suburb of Jerusalem on the eastern side of Mount Olivet) Jesus was a frequent and welcome visitor. The family were probably orphans. Socially, they were of considerable importance, in Bethany at least, and their home had some pretensions to luxury. Even to-day its ruins, as pointed out to travelers, indicate a mansion of unusual size and claims to opulence. Lazarus fell sick, and the sisters after vainly applying such medical skill as was at their command in the little village, despatched a messenger in great haste to Jesus who was then twenty-five miles distant in the Perea, on the thither side of the Jordan, preaching to the people and healing the sick. Christ received the messenger calmly. The latter, dust-stained and travel-worn, had been a full day on the road, and on the very day of his arrival, Lazarus died, though he knew it not. Jesus, however, knew all, and sent the messenger back to the sorrowing home, saying: "The sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby." This strange and seemingly unsympathetic response must have mystified those who received it. Meanwhile the home at Bethany was the scene of mourning. Friends came from Jerusalem and the country round about, to be present at the obsequies of the departed. A grave was chosen in a beautiful garden on property belonging to the family. In those days, cemeteries were principally devoted to the interment of paupers and strangers. Wealthy and even moderately well-to-do people had private burying-grounds, and these were usually chosen in some secluded and picturesque spot, near the ancestral home and on the ancestral soil. That of Lazarus was, like thousands of other tombs in Palestine, a chamber or recess cut sheer into the face of the limestone rock, or fashioned out of some natural cave in the cliff, and closed with a heavy stone that swung into a groove, excluding all air and light and affording ample protection against desecration by prowling animals. There the body was laid, having first been anointed with spices and made fragrant with myrtle, aloes and rose water, then robed in the garments worn in life and finally swathed in linen wrappings.

After the interment, the days of mourning continued. Hired mourners beat their breasts, their heads and their feet and wailed, wept and sang, while they extolled the virtues of the departed. The death-flutes sounded gloomily throughout the home. The sisters, dumb with their great sorrow, sat apart, enveloped in heavy veils. Friends were comforting them as best they could, when the news reached Martha's ears that "Jesus was coming." He had indeed returned from beyond Jordan. He had told his disciples in loving tenderness: "Our friend Lazarus is fallen asleep," and they, misapprehending him, replied that it was well, as he would then probably recover. Thereupon the Master of spoke plainly: "He is dead, and I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent that ye may believe. Nevertheless, let us go unto him." The disciples hesitated; but to cross the Jordan was to come again within the reach of priestly power and malice. They believed that if Jesus came to Jerusalem, the Council would arrest and kill him, and that they also would probably share his fate. But loyalty and courage prevailed, and all accompanied him.

Martha, meeting Christ, immediately on from the fullness of her heart, in a half reproachful word, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." She had begun despairingly yet almost with the same breath, she declared her belief in Jesus' divinity and mission and exclaimed, "Whatsoever thou wilt of God, will give it thee." To test her faith still further, and lead her mind to the things of eternal life, the Saviour told her that her brother would rise again. "I know," she responded, "he will rise again in the resurrect

The Tabernacle Pulpit

ANYTHING IN DREAMS?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Genesis 28. 11: "He took of the stones of that place and put them for his pillows, and he dreamed that place to sleep and he dreamed."

A SLEEP on a pillow-case filled with hens' feathers it is not strange one should have pleasant dreams. But here is a pillow of rock, and Jacob with his head on it, and lo! a dream of angels, two processions, those coming down the stairs met by those going up the stairs. It is the first dream of Bible record. You may say of a dream that it is nocturnal fantasia, or that it is the absurd combination of waking thoughts, and with a slur of intonation you may say: "It is only a dream;" but God has honored the dream by making it the avenue through which again and again he has marched upon the human soul, decided the fate of nations, and changed the course of the world's history. God appeared in a dream to Abimelech, warning him against an unlawful marriage; in a dream to Joseph, foretelling his coming power under the figure of all the sheaves of the harvest bowing down to his sheaf; to the chief butler, foretelling his disimprisonment; to the chief baker, announcing his decapitation; to Pharaoh, showing him first the seven plenty years, and then the seven famine-struck years, under the figure of the seven fat cows devouring the seven lean cows; to Solomon, giving him the choice between wisdom and riches and honor; to the warrior, under the figure of a barley cake smiting down a tent, encouraging Gideon in his battle against the Amalekites; to Nebuchadnezzar, under the figure of a broken image and a hewn-down tree, foretelling his overthrow of power; to Joseph, of the New Testament, announcing the birth of Christ in his own household; to Mary, bidding her fly from Herodic persecutions; to Pilate's wife, warning him not to become complicated with the judicial overthrow of Christ.

We all admit that God in ancient times and under Bible dispensation addressed the people through dreams. The question is, does God appear in our day and reveal himself through dreams? That is the question everybody asks, and this question this morning I shall try to answer. You ask me if I believe in dreams. My answer is, I do believe in them, but all I have to say will be easily [illegible]

[illegible] the first: the Scriptures are so [illegible] that if we get no communication from him in [illegible] night, nevertheless, to be [illegible]

[illegible] this magnificent [illegible] the eyes [illegible] closed, the senses are dull, the entire [illegible] goes into a lethargy which in all [illegible] is used as a type of death, and [illegible] the soul spreads its wing and never sleeps. It leaps the Atlantic Ocean and mingles in scenes three thousand miles away. It travels great reaches of time, dreamed about the first night they slept in a new house. If in their dream they take the hand of a corpse, they are going to die. If they dream of a garden, it means a sepulchre. If something turns out according to a night vision, they say, "Well, I am not surprised. I dreamed it." If it turns out different from the night vision, they say, "Well, dreams go by contraries." In their efforts to put their dreams into rhythm, they put their waking thoughts into discord. Now, the Bible is so full of revelation that we ought to be satisfied if we get no further revelation.

Sound sleep received great honor when Adam slept so extraordinarily that the surgical incision which gave him Eve did not wake him; but there is no such need for extraordinary slumber now, and he who catches an Eve must needs be wide-awake! No need of such a dream as Jacob had with a ladder against the sky, when ten thousand times it had been demonstrated that earth and heaven are in communication. No such dream needed as that which was given to Abimelech, warning him against an unlawful marriage, when we have the records of the county clerk's office. No need of such a dream as was given to Pharaoh about the seven years of famine, for now the seasons march in regular procession, and steamer and rail-train carry breadstuffs to every famine-struck nation. No need of a dream like that which encouraged Gideon, for all through Christendom it is announced and acknowledged and demonstrated that righteousness, sooner or later, will get the victory.

If there should come about a crisis in your life upon which the Bible does not seem to be sufficiently specific, go to God in prayer and you will get especial direction. I have more faith, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, in directions given you with the Bible in your lap and your thoughts uplifted in prayer to God, than in all the information you will get unconscious on your pillow. I can very easily understand why the Babylonians and the Egyptians, with no Bible, should put so much stress on dreams; and the Chinese, in their holy book, Chow King, should think their emperor gets his directions through dreams from God; and that Homer should think that all dreams came from Jove, and that in ancient times dreams were classified into a science; but why do you and I put so [illegible] upon [illegible] a supernal book of infinite wisdom on all subjects? Why should we harry ourselves with dreams? Why should Eddystone and Barnegat lighthouses question a summer fire-fly?

Remark the second: all dreams have an important meaning.

They prove that the soul is comparatively independent of the body. The eyes are closed, the senses are dull, the entire [illegible] flashes back eighty years, and the octogenarian is a boy again in his father's house. If the soul, before it has entirely broken its chain of flesh, can do all this, how far can it leap, what circles can it cut when it is fully liberated! Every dream, whether agreeable or harrassing, whether sunshiny or tempestuous, means so much that rising from your couch you ought to kneel down and say: "O God! am I immortal? Whence? Whither? Two natures. My soul caged now—what when the door of the cage is opened? If my soul can fly so far in the few hours in which my body is asleep in the night, how far can it fly when my body sleeps the long sleep of the grave?" Oh, this power to dream, how startling, how overwhelming! If prepared for the after-death flight, what an enchantment! If not prepared for the after-death flight, what a crushing agony! Immortal! Immortal!

Remark the third: the vast majority of dreams are merely the result of disturbed physical condition, and are not a supernatural message.

Job had carbuncles, and he was scared in the night. He says: "Thou scarest me with dreams and terrifiest me with visions." Solomon had an overwrought brain, overwrought with public business, and he suffered from erratic slumber, and he writes in Ecclesiastes: "A dream cometh through the multitude of business." Dr. Gregory, in experimenting with dreams, found that a bottle of hot water put to his feet while in slumber made him think that he was going up the hot sides of Mount Etna. Another morbid physician, experimenting with dreams, his feet uncovered through sleep, thought he was riding in an Alpine diligence. But a great many dreams are merely narcotic disturbance. Anything that you see while under the influence of chloral or brandy, or "hasheesh," or laudanum, is not a revelation from God. The learned De Quincey did not ascribe to divine communication what he saw in sleep, opium saturated; dreams which he afterward described in the following words: "I was worshipped, I was sacrificed. I fled from the wrath of Brahmah, through all the forests of Asia. Vishnu hated me. Sceva laid in wait for me. I came suddenly upon Isis and Osiris. I had done a deed, they said, that made the crocodiles tremble. I was buried for a thousand years in stone coffins, with mummies and sphinxes in narrow chambers in the heart of eternal pyramids. I was kissed with the cancerous kiss of crocodiles, and lay confounded with unutterable slimy things among wreathy and Nilotic mud." Do not mistake narcotic disturbance for divine revelation.

But I have to tell you that the majority of the dreams are merely the penalty of outraged digestive organs, and you have no right to mistake the nightmare for heavenly revelation. Late suppers are a warranty deed for bad dreams. Highly-spiced salads at eleven o'clock at night, instead of opening the door heavenward, open the door infernal and diabolical. You outrage natural law, and you insult the God who made those laws. It takes from three to five hours to digest food, and you have no right to keep your digestive organs in struggle when the rest of your body is in somnolence. The general rule is, eat nothing after six o'clock at night, retire at ten, sleep on your right side, keep the window open five inches for ventilation, and other worlds will not disturb you much. By physical maltreatment you take the ladder that Jacob saw in his dream and you lower it to the nether world, allowing the ascent of the demoniacal. Dreams are midnight dyspepsia. An unregulated desire for something to eat ruined the race in Paradise, and an unregulated desire for something to eat keeps it ruined. The world during six thousand years has tried in vain to digest that first apple. The world will not be evangelized until we get rid of a dyspeptic Christianity. Healthy people do not want this cadaverous and sleepy thing that some people call religion. They want a religion that lives regularly by day and sleeps soundly by night. If through trouble or coming on of old age, or exhaustion of Christian service you cannot sleep well, then you may expect from God "songs in the night;" but there are no blessed communications to those who willingly surrender to indigestibles. Napoleon's army at Leipsic, Dresden, and Borodino, came near being destroyed through the disturbed gastric juices of its commander. That is the way you have lost some of your battles.

Another remark I make is that our dreams are apt to be merely the echo of our day thoughts.

I will give you a recipe for pleasant dreams: Fill your days with elevated thought and unselfish action, and your dreams will be set to music. If all day you are gouging and grasping and avaricious, in your dreams you will see gold that you cannot clutch, and bargains in which you were out-shylocked. If during the day you are irascible and pugnacious and gunpowdery of disposition, you will at night have battle with enemies in which they will get the best of you. If you are all day long in a hurry, at night you will dream of rail-trains that you want to catch while you cannot move one inch toward the depot.

If you are always over suspicious and expectant of assault, you will have at night hallucinations of assassins with daggers drawn. No one wonders that Richard III. the iniquitous, the night before the battle of Bosworth Field dreamed that all those whom he had murdered stared at him, and that he was torn to pieces by demons from the pit. The scholar's dream is a philosophic echo. The poet's dream is a rhythmic echo. Coleridge composed his "Kubla Khan" asleep in a narcotic dream, and waking up, wrote down three hundred lines of it. Tartini, the violin player, composed his most wonderful sonata while asleep in a dream so vivid, that waking he easily transferred it to paper, Waking thoughts have their echo in sleeping thoughts. If a man spends his life in trying to make others happy, and is heavenly-minded, around his pillow he will see cripples who have got over their crutch, and processions of celestial imperials, and hear the grand march roll down from drums of heaven over jasper parapets. You are very apt to hear in dreams what you hear when you are wide awake.

Now, having shown you that having a Bible we ought to be satisfied not getting any further communication from God, and having shown you that all dreams have an important mission, since they show the comparative independence of the soul from the body, and having shown you that the majority of dreams are a result of disturbed physical condition, and having shown you that our sleeping thoughts are apt to be an echo of our waking thoughts, I come now to my fifth and most important remark, and that is to say, that it is capable of proof that God does sometimes in our day, and has often since the close of the Bible dispensation, appeared to people in dreams.

All dreams that make you better are from God. How do I know it? Is not God the source of all good? It does not take a very logical mind to argue that out. Tertullian and Martin Luther believed in dreams. The dreams of John Huss are immortal. St. Augustine, the Christian father, gives us the fact that a Carthaginian physician was persuaded of the immortality of the soul by an argument which he heard in a dream. The night before his assassination the wife of Julius Cæsar dreamed that her husband fell dead across her lap. It is possible to prove that God does appear in dreams to warn, to convert, and to save men.

My friend, a retired sea-captain and a Christian, tells me that one night while on the sea he dreamed that a ship's crew were in great suffering. Waking up from his dream, he put about the ship, tacked in different directions, surprised everybody on the vessel—they thought he was going crazy—sailed on in another direction hour after hour, and for many hours until he came to the perishing crew and rescued them, and brought them to New York. Who conducted that dream? The God of the sea.

In 1695, a vessel went out from Spithead for West India, and ran against the ledge of rocks called the Caskets. The vessel went down, but the crew clambered up on the Caskets, to die of thirst or starvation, as they supposed. But there was a ship bound for Southampton that had the captain's son on board. This lad twice in one night dreamed that there was a crew of sailors dying on the Caskets. He told his father of his dream. The vessel came down by the Caskets in time to find and to rescue those poor dying men. Who conducted that dream? The God of the rocks, the God of the sea.

The Rev. Dr. Bushnell, in his marvelous book, entitled: "Nature and the Supernatural," gives the following fact that he got from Captain Yount, in California, a fact confirmed by many families: Captain Yount dreamed twice one night that one hundred and fifty miles away there was a company of travelers fast in the snow. He also saw in the dream, rocks of peculiar formation, and telling his dream to an old hunter, the hunter said: "Why, I remember those rocks; those rocks are in the Carson Valley Pass, one hundred and fifty miles away." Captain Yount, impelled by this dream, although laughed at by his neighbors, gathered men together, took mules and blankets, and started out on the expedition, traveled one hundred and fifty miles, saw those very rocks which he had described in his dream, and finding the suffering ones at the foot of those rocks, brought them back to confirm the story of Captain Yount. Who conducted that dream? The God of the snow, the God of the Sierra Nevadas.

God has often appeared in dreams to rescue and comfort. You have known people—perhaps it is something I state in your own experience—you have seen people go to sleep with bereavements inconsolable, and they awakened in perfect resignation because of what they had seen in slumber. Dr. Crannage, one of the most remarkable men I ever met—remarkable for benevolence and great philanthropies—at Wellington, England, showed me a house where the Lord had appeared in a wonderful dream to a poor woman. The woman was rheumatic, sick, poor to the last point of destitution. She was waited on and cared for by another poor woman, her only attendant. Word came to her one day that this poor woman had died, and the invalid of whom I am speaking lay helpless upon the couch, wondering what would become of her. In that mood she fell asleep. In her dreams she said the Angel of the Lord appeared, and took her into the open air and pointed in one direction, and there were mountains of bread, and pointed in another direction, and there were mountains of butter, and in another direction, and there were mountains of all kinds of worldly supply. The Angel of the Lord said to her: "Woman, all these mountains belong to your Father, and do you think that he will let you, his child, hunger and die?" Dr. Crannage told me by some divine impulse he went into that destitute home, saw the suffering there, and administered unto it, caring for her all the way through. Do you tell me that that dream was woven out of earthly anodynes? Was that the phantasmagoria of a diseased brain? No; it was an all-sympathetic God addressing a poor woman through a dream.

Furthermore, I have to say that there are people in this house who were converted to God through a dream. The Rev. John Newton, the fame of whose piety fills all Christendom, while a profligate sailor on shipboard, in his dream, thought that a being approached him and gave him a very beautiful ring, and put it upon his finger, and said to him, "As long as you wear that ring you will be prospered; if you lose that ring you will be ruined." In the same dream another personage appeared, and by a strange infatuation persuaded John Newton to throw that ring overboard, and it sank into the sea. Then the mountains in sight were full of fire and the air was lurid with consuming wrath. While John Newton was repenting of his folly in having thrown overboard the treasure, another personage came through the dream, and told John Newton he would plunge into the sea and bring the ring up if he desired it. He plunged into the sea and brought it up, and said to John Newton, "Here is that gem, but I think I will keep it for you, lest you lose it again;" and John Newton consented, and all the fire went out from the mountains, and all the signs of lurid wrath disappeared from the air, and John Newton said that he saw in his dream that that valuable gem was his soul, and that the being who persuaded him to throw it overboard was Satan, and that the One who plunged in and restored that gem, keeping it for him, was Christ. And that dream makes one of the most wonderful chapters in the life of that most wonderful man.

RESCUED THROUGH A DREAM.

A German was crossing the Atlantic Ocean, and in his dream he saw a man with a handful of white flowers, and he was told to follow the man who had that handful of white flowers. The German, arriving in New York, wandered into the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, and Mr. Lamphier—whom many of you know—the great apostle of prayer-meetings, that day had given to him a bunch of tube-roses. They stood on his desk, and at the close of the religious services he took the tube-roses and started homeward, and the German followed him, and through an interpreter told Mr. Lamphier that on the sea he had dreamed of a man with a handful of white flowers and was told to follow him. Suffice it to say, through that interview and following interviews, he became a Christian, and is a city missionary preaching the Gospel to his own countrymen. God in a dream!

John Hardock, while on shipboard, dreamed one night that the day of judgment had come, and that the roll of the ship's crew was called, except his own name, and that these people, this crew, were all banished; and in his dream he asked the reader why his own name was omitted, and he was told it was to give him more opportunity for repentance. He woke up a different man. He became illustrious for Christian attainment. If you do not believe these things, then you must discard all testimony, and refuse to accept any kind of authoritative witness. God in a dream!

Rev. Herbert Mendes was converted to God through a dream of the last judgment; and I doubt if there is a man or woman in this house to-day that has not had some dream of that great day of judgment which shall be the winding up of the world's history. If you have not dreamed of it, perhaps to-night you may dream of that day. There are enough materials to make a dream. Enough voices, for there shall be the roaring of the elements, and the great earthquake. Enough light for the dream, for the world shall blaze. Enough excitement, for the mountains shall fall. Enough water, for the ocean shall roar. Enough astronomical phenomena, for the stars shall go out. Enough populations, for all the races of all the ages will fall into line of one of two processions, the one ascending and the other descending, the one led on by the Rider on the white horse of eternal victory, the other led on by Apollyon on the black charger of eternal defeat. The dream comes on me now, and I see the lightnings from above answering the volcanic disturbances from beneath, and I hear the long reverberating thunders that shall wake up the dead, and on one side I see the opening of a gate into scenes golden and amethystine, and on the other side I hear the clanging back of a gate into Bastiles of eternal bondage, and all the seas lifting up their crystal voices, cry: "Come to judgment!" and all the voices of the heaven cry: "Come to judgment!" and crumbling mausoleum, and Westminster Abbeys, and pyramids of the dead with marble voices, cry: "Come to judgment!"

And the great archangel seizes an instrument of music which has never yet been sounded, an instrument of music that was made only for one sound, and thrusting that mighty trumpet through the clouds, and turning it this way, he shall put it to his lip and blow the long, loud blast that shall make the solid earth quiver, crying: "Come to judgment!"

Then from this earthly grossness quit,
Attired in stars, we shall forever sit.

at the last day." Then, like a glorious revelation overwhelming her soul, came the thrilling words from the lips of the Master of Life: "I am the Resurrection and the Life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead yet shall he live; and whosoever believeth on me shall never die."

"Death," wrote a famous Christian commentator, "is the sleep of the saints, in the language of heaven." Lazarus had been asleep in death four days when Jesus entered the desolated home at Bethany. He was unmoved by the noisy lamentations of the hired mourners, but the mute grief of the sisters touched the Divine heart, and when he saw Mary weeping, prostrate at his feet, her beautiful yellow hair trailing in the dust, he "groaned in spirit and was troubled." He asked, gently, "Where have ye laid him?" and the answer came, in whispers broken by bitter sobbing: "Come and see." Silent tears dropped from the eyes of the Master, which caused the observant mourners to remark: "Behold how he loved him!" If there had been lacking in his ministry a single sublime proof of his complete sympathy with humanity, it was found in this spectacle of the Son of God shedding tears—not of sorrow or repentance or regret, but tears of love—with these stricken friends.

It was a strange gathering that assembled in the garden on that afternoon, before the tomb in which, four days agone, the beloved dead had been laid. St. John's narrative tells, with a beautiful simplicity of detail, all that occurred: the alternate doubts and fears of the relatives, the explanation by the practical Martha, which showed how little hope she had, after all, of any real help from the Master. But Divine Omnipotence had chosen this hour when all human hopes were utterly blasted, in which to assert itself. The stone was rolled away, and at the command of Jesus, "he that was dead came forth," yet bound in the cerements of the tomb. Who can picture the wonder, the joy, the ecstacy of that moment when the brother, but lately lost, was restored to the sisters? Their faith in Jesus, strong before, was now rendered impregnable, and gratitude overflowed their hearts. Never in the history of the world had so stupendous a miracle been wrought, and it necessarily made multitudes of converts to the faith, even while it intensified the hate of the Sanhedrim, who now plotted the destruction of both Jesus and Lazarus. To this even Caiaphas, the Sadducean high priest, assented. Lazarus lived thirty years after being restored from the grave, and tradition states that after the death of Jesus, he went to Provence with his sisters, and preached the Gospel in Marseilles, finally dying in Cyprus at a ripe old age.

The photograph on the first page of this issue of The Christian Herald is one that will interest every believer. It is an accurate representation of a very ancient, rock cavern-tomb at Bethany, and is affirmed on undisputed local authority, to be the identical scene of this greatest of our Saviour's miracles—the raising of Lazarus. Through all the changes of the centuries it has been wonderfully preserved, having been faithfully guarded and repaired from time to time, and it still remains as a mute memorial of that day when the "Master of Life" stretched forth his hand, and the obedient grave gave up its prey.

Such was the fame of this great miracle that in later days the name of Bethany has been changed to that of el-Azariyeh, or simply Lazarieh. The village is now a comparative ruin—a mere hamlet, occupied by a score of families. Its inhabitants point out not only the traditionary tomb shown in the photograph, but also the house of Lazarus. Of the latter only a square tower now remains. The tomb is a deep vault in the rocks and the bottom is reached by twenty-six steps. This was the standard style of sepulchre among the Jews, and varied but little from the usages in patriarchal times. Only kings, princes and prophets were buried in cities; all others were placed in tombs without the walls, usually in gardens, on roadsides or even adjoining houses, in the open country.

There are several notable differences between the ancient Jewish methods of interment and those of other contemporary nations. No sarcophagus or coffin was used at a Jewish funeral; no pyramid was raised, and, strangest of all, no inscription or painting either naming the dead, declaring his virtues, or expressing the religious attitude of the race toward death and the grave, was ever placed upon a tomb. In New Testament days, there were probably in existence many of the tombs of famous prophets, to repair and adorn which the Jews regarded as a work of piety. A majority have been obliterated by the ravages of time.

AFFLICTIONS SANCTIFIED.

S. S. Lesson for April 9. Job. 5: 17-27. Golden Text, Heb. 12: 6. By Mrs M. Baxter.

"WHOM the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." (Heb. 12:6.) So spake God in his own Word, and yet the majority of men look upon trial, if they recognize God's hand in it at all as a righteous retribution for wrongdoing; and they seek to find some reason in the life and conduct of the afflicted one, which will justify God in thus causing him to suffer. The spirit of judgment belongs to our fallen nature, grace refers everything to God, and suspends judgment. It is God's loved ones whom he chastens or educates, his received sons whom he scourges, and he does it for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness." Job was one of God's loved ones, a received son. Therefore it was worth God's while to take pains with his education. Just because the Lord put him through more tests than almost any other man of the old dispensation. It was God's own testimony regarding him, a testimony born by Satan himself, that there was "none like him in the earth, a perfect man and an upright one that feareth God, and escheweth evil." There was not another man upon earth whom God could have trusted to pass through the trials to which he had called Job; it was a proof of his faithfulness and not of his sin, that his Lord could deal with him as he did. What other man could have borne to hear in one day of the total loss of all his property; oxen, asses, sheep, camels, servants, and above all, the terrible bereavement of all his children, without a possibility of a last farewell,—and yet have looked up to the God who could have prevented all this evil, with confidence and submission? Job said: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord?" A man who, under such circumstances can not only bow down in the submission of endurance, but can look up and praise the Lord, can have even God himself as Witness that he is a "perfect man and an upright one that feareth God and escheweth evil." God had borne this witness to him before he was tested, but now it was proved beyond dispute, and Satan himself, whom God had challenged to test him was driven to other resources than the greatest external losses, before he could in any way touch the man whose confidence in God was so great.

He Could Count Upon Him

Tried child of God, do not let the enemy persuade you that trial is punishment. Education [illegible] like that of the Master [illegible] Man, "learned obedience [illegible] he suffered." But it is [illegible], or righteous retribution for [illegible] when your Lord leads you into [illegible] where few are called, or permitted to tread.

God has Other Thoughts:

He leads thee where all that is human, all that [illegible] where only the being [illegible] Divine Nature; only [illegible] "the hope of glory" will be [illegible] but the end is to [illegible] In the education [illegible] this [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

YOUNG SOLDIERS OF THE KING.

The Phenomenal Growth and Extending Influence of the Boys' Brigade, Here and Abroad —Teaching True Christian Manliness and Military Discipline Together—Brigade Rules.

THE Boys' Brigade, which is spreading all over the United States and Canada, had its origin in Glasgow, Scotland. It is a religious society with a military organization. Its object is, according to the constitution, the advancement of Christ's kingdom among boys, and the promotion of habits of discipline, self-respect and all that tends towards true Christian manliness. Every member is bound in honor and duty to govern his conduct by the following rules: To read his Bible every day, to abstain from liquor and tobacco, never to use profane language and to avoid the company of those who do; always to prefer duty to either pleasure or inclination; to obey strictly the Company rules; to endeavor constantly to maiptain the kindness, courtesy and Christian confidence that should prevail in a company of Christian boys.

On the 4th of October, 1883, twenty-eight boys and three teachers in a Sunday School in the Northwest District of Glasgow met together and called themselves "The Boys' Brigade," and in the ten years that have elapsed since then, this simple beginning has grown into a regularly-constituted organization, with headquarters in Glasgow, Scotland; and also in San Francisco, Chicago and Boston, and now numbers 21,000 boys in Glasgow alone, with 490 companies. The growth in has been so rapid, that it has outrun any reliable figures. At the close of 1892 there were 112 companies in the United States, with an estimated attendance of about 4,000 boys. This did not include fully as many more company organizations in different parts of the country who had not reported to headquarters. The original Brigade in Scotland was constituted of boys between twelve and seventeen years of age, who were members of some Sunday School or Christian organization. This movement originated in 1883, and was the conception of W. A. Smith, of the First Lanark Rifles, Glasgow, Scotland. Mr. Smith had been a member of a military company for a number of years, and was interested in Sunday School work. He recognized the fact that the boys, after reaching the age of sixteen years, drifted away from the Church, and it occurred to him that a military organization in connection with the Sunday School might prove attractive to them. With this end in view, he called together the twenty-eight boys and three teachers. His success was marked from the beginning. Its simplicity and practical nature commended it to many who were interested in boys, and the organization rapidly grew to its present membership.

In the organization of the Brigade are three distinct factors: First, the Company, second, the Battalion, and third, the Brigade. The Company is a detachment of boys connected with each church or school. It has a local designation, and is numbered according to the order of formation. These companies are connected with Protestant denominations, and, although the Brigade is undenominational, it is part of the constitution that each individual Company must be connected with a church, mission or other Christian organization. Wherever there are three or more companies, a Battalion is formed. The officers of the Company form the Battalion Council. The term "Brigade" which is used very frequently with a wrong meaning, embraces the whole organization. A Company is designated as, "The First Detroit Co. of the Boys' Brigade."

Prof. Henry Drummond, Hon. Vice-President of the Boys' Brigade, says:

"Contrary to the somewhat natural impression, the Boys' Brigade

Does not Teach the Art of War

nor does it foster or encourage the war spirit. It simply implies military organization, drill and discipline, as the most stimulating and interesting means of securing the attention of the boys, and of establishing in them self-respect, chivalry, courtesy and the host of kindred virtues. To teach drill is not to teach the art of war nor is the drill spirit a war spirit." The true aspiration in teaching the Brigade could not be better summarized than in this quotation from its efficient leader:

"Our boys are full of earnest desire to be true men, and if you want to make them brave, true, Christian men, we must direct this desire in the right channel, and show them that in the service of Christ they will find the bravest, truest life it is possible for them to live. The foundation of the Boys' Brigade is laid on this idea: To win boys for Christ by presenting them with that view of Christianity to which we know their natures will most readily respond. There are points where religious teaching directly comes in. Every company being connected with some existing Christian organization, the boys are urged to attend whatever Bible class exists, and wherever no existing interest is conflicted with, the Captains usually provide a class of their own. These special Company classes are a part of the work, and are usually attended by a very large per cent of the boys, who are members of the Company. The work of the Brigade is divided in Scotland into two principal departments: the military drill, and the Bible class work. In the United States a department has been added known as the Missionary Society. The drill is in all essential parts a regular military drill, and the boys are expected to yield perfect obedience to discipline. The drill differs only as to location. In England and Canada the drill is that of the officers and soldiers in Her Majesty's service. In the United States it is the official United States Infantry tactics. In addition to the drill department supervision is made over the physical development of the boy. Athletic clubs are formed. The various setting up exercises of the United States Infantry tactics, and other gymnastic systems are adopted. Summer camps are organized, which are conducted under the care and attention of the officers of the church.

One of the most interesting features of the work is the 'Ambulance Drill,' in which the study of anatomy and physiology is symplified and brought before the boy to enable him to be of assistance in cases of emergency. This portion of the work has been developed to a very high state of perfection. The organization of drum corps, bands for street parade, etc., is encouraged. Everything that would tend to the development of the manly side of the boy is fostered under the auspices of the church. Reading and club rooms have also been formed by some Companies, and are valuable social and educational influences. In Glasgow the work has drawn to itself the attention of some of the ablest thinkers of the day. The Earl of Aberdeen, the Hon. President of the Boys' Brigade is an enthusiastic friend of the work. Among the Vice Presidents we find the names of the Earl of Mount Edgecumbe, the Right Honorable Lord Kinnaird, General Sir Donald Stewart, Sir Thomas Clark, and Prof. Henry Drummond, whose able pen has been enlisted in this work, and who has contributed quite largely to its literature. The President is J. C. Alston, No. 9 Loraine Gardens, Glasgow. Mr. W. A. Smith, the originator of the movement is the Brigade Secretary, with headquarters at No. 68 Bath Street, Glasgow, Scotland.

The History of the Movement in the United States begins with the organization of the First San Francisco Company, August 10th, 1889. Previous to this there was one Company formed in Minneapolis, but for some reason the work was given up. After a few months of drilling the Second San Francisco Company, and the First Alameda were organized and very soon after a temporary organization was formed, which has since grown into its present magnitude. The Rev. J. Q. Adams, San Francisco, Cal., is President of The Boys' Brigade in America, and A. H. Fish of the same city Brigade Secretary. The work in the United States developed under the fostering care of these gentlemen. Companies were formed in other cities, notably Chicago and Cincinnati. In Chicago under the care of Rev. Howard H. Russell of Armour Mission, seven Companies were organized uniformed and brought to a condition of perfect discipline. In Cincinnati the Rev. Johnston Meyers organized seven Companies in connection with the mission work of his church. These Companies have all united with the general organization.

The field in the United States having been found too large to be handled by a single headquarters, was divided into three sections, the Western, the Central and Eastern, each with a vice-President, General Secretary and members of the executive committee. The President and Brigade-Secretary have charge of the Western Division, and are the head of the organization. General O. O. Howard is the vice-President of the Central division, Rev. Howard H. Russel, Secretary. The Eastern division is in charge of Rev. Willard E. Waterbury, as vice-President. T. Frank Fernald as Secretary. For the last year the work has grown with great rapidity, numerous Companies forming in all parts of the United States, twenty-seven states and three territories being represented in recent reports.

The Canadian Organization is under the charge of the Rev. T. F. Fotheringham of St. Johns, Canada, as President, and T. W. Nesbit of Sarnia, Canada, as Brigade Secretary. There are some twenty-three or four Companies reported at Headquarters, and a large number of Companies now forming.

The organization has its literature, which has been brought to perfection by the ablest writers of the day. It supports a very handsome monthly magazine in Scotland, The Boys' Brigade Gazette, and is represented in the United States and Canada by The Boys' Brigade Courier, a weekly international sixteen page illustrated paper, published in Detroit. It has also a monthly paper, The Bulletin, published on the Pacific coast, while a number of the Companies connected with churches have small papers devoted to the work.

The growth of the organization bids fair to outrun anything of a similar nature brought into the Christian work. The reports from the different churches having a company of, The Boys' Brigade in connection with their Sunday School are very encouraging. They report increased attendance, and a higher order of morality on the part of the boys, and better than all this, frequent accessions to the church. A careful study of the work for two years prompts the following deductions: The Boys Brigade offers a safe and sure method of holding the boys during that time when they are most liable to slip away from the church influencess

SCENES IN THE BOYS' BRIGADE.

The military features of the work develope the physical nature of the boy; the discipline developes his love of order and his willingness to obey the commands of his superiors. The organization of the Company is such that it permits the teachers to get in close touch with the boys, and if rightly organized the Bible class can be made one of the most efficient methods of saving the boys.

The vastness of the field and the rapid growth of this work prevents anything more than a brief summary of its essential points.

THE HEART'S OPEN DOOR.

O LORD, to-day, behold my grief,
Because of doubt and anxious fear.
I know thou canst afford relief,
And let me feel thy presence near.

I ask no earthly joy beside,
Till this alone thou dost bestow.
Come near, and in my soul abide,
And cleanse and make me white as snow.

Oh blessed rest! Oh sacred peace!
To feel thee near, and that to bless.
Make all rebellious actions cease,
And clothe me in thy righteousness.

'Tis rest, O Lord, to work for thee,
For strength divine thou dost supply.
Reveal thy will in love to me,
As on thy help I now rely.

Guide thou my steps from day to day,
And give of earth what suits thy will;
So shall I walk the shining way
And all the terms of grace fulfil.

A GOOD DAY.

WHAT is "a good day?" Does it depend upon the length of the day? No. Some of the most disastrous days we have ever had were in the summer time when the days were long; while some of the happiest have been in the holidays, which are always short. A good day does not depend upon the amount of money we make. A man may make a thousand dollars in a day and yet be unfortunate; while a man may lose a thousand dollars another day, and be happy.

We shall give some of the characteristics of a good day. It begins about six or seven o'clock. We have not much sympathy with this qualification of early rising. In the country where people may retire at eight or nine o'clock in the evening, a rousing bell at five o'clock in the morning may not be unchristian; but where, because of the imperious customs of city life, we have engagements taking us late into the night, a good day will be found to begin at six or seven o'clock in the morning. Great damage has been done to people by the stereotyped story of Napoleon, who slept only three hours; but remember that you have neither Napoleon's work to do nor Napoleon's brains. Albert Barnes went every morning to his study at four o'clock, and did a glorious work for God and the Church. The first penalty he paid was the loss of his sight; [illegible] the breaking down of his entire health. It would have been better if he had spread the work over more years; then we might have had him to this day, [illegible] all his illustrious faculties devoted to God. If we have twenty miles to ride and in the first ten miles we drive our horse so fast that we can go no further, we are not a wise driver.

We ought to rise in the morning rest- [illegible] seven o'clock. Further, a good day be- [illegible] no more think of going to business without communion with Christ, than of go- [illegible] We need to have a very poor [illegible] and to set it every morning in order that we might make from it a guess about the time of day. Our souls are poor timepieces, utterly disordered; [illegible] by the Sun of Righteousness. Before we start off to the store we need to pray for patience. We will be harassed and perplexed. Men will wrong us, and impose upon us, and cheat us; and before the day is past, if you have not laid in a large supply of patience, you will half swear with your lips, and perhaps make a whole swear with your hearts.

Further, a good day is one that accomplishes something positive in a religious way. You will pass five hundred or a thousand men in the street. They will all, in a very short time, be in eternity. Over which one of the five hundred men that you met to-day, did you exert a positively religious influence? A merchant comes in from Chicago to buy a bill of goods. But that is only a subordinate fact in that man's history. God sent him there, perhaps, to see what you would do for his soul. Ask him where he goes to church; and if he goes to church you will immediately have a line of influence between your heart and his. If he goes nowhere to church, then you have a point at which, in a courteous manner, you may move upon his soul. You may go into a young man's store and find him discouraged. His countenance is clouded. Ask what is the matter. Tell him of your own early struggles, and how, by the grace of God, you got out of them. Stop on your way to and from business, at the houses of suffering and sickness. One "Good-morning," or "Good evening," may bring comfort and heaven to a suffering soul. That is a good day in which you make some one happy. It is astonishing how little it takes to make one happy. Feel that the day is wasted in which you have not succeeded in this. Never put upon any one an unnecessary burden. Never tell a man what mean things you have heard about him. If you find in a newspaper an unpleasant paragraph in regard to him, do not cut it out and send it to him by mail. Do not write him a valentine. About the best man in the world we could rake up in society enough unpleasant things to make him miserable.

Further, a good ends with God. You will at the close of the day find that you have made many mistakes, said things you ought not to have said, and done things you ought not to have done. Confess it frankly in your prayer to God. Go to bed at peace with all the world.

A DISCOURAGED TIME.

EVERY spring-time a multitude of young men start out from law schools and medical colleges and theological seminaries, and are waiting for practical life. Positions do not immediately open. The young minister, diploma in pocket and licenced, is waiting for a call. He has preached in three or four places, and has not yet heard from them in any emphatic way. He begins to conclude that perhaps he has got into the wrong profession, and that he may have mistaken the Lord's call. Churches are not appreciative of his style. They want a young man with more physical stature, or glibber tongue, or different color of hair. Meanwhile, a fair girl is waiting to stand up with him at the marriage altar, and is wondering that her affianced, the most wonderful young man in all the world, is not almost pulled apart by congregations, all anxious to get him at the same time. Be patient, young theological. Some of the mightiest men of the Church passed many months before getting a call. At the right time, and when your heart is prepared to hear the divine voice leading you in any direction, you will find a large envelope with letter in the post office, signed by six or seven church officials, deciding for you what you ought to do. Within a year you will be master of a parsonage and a pulpit—if the pulpit does not master you. The Lord, having given you hammer and adze and plane, is going to give you a shop to work in.

So the young lawyer. He has his embryo library in calf-skin. Has had his breakfast, and sits in his office waiting all day long for clients. No one comes. Legal education wasted. Might as well have been reading Bulwer's novels as Blackstone. The world seems ruinously peaceful. But only wait. Two farmers have had a quarrel about a line fence. The probability is that one of them will take off his coat and give the other a tremendous drubbing. It will surely be a case of assault and battery, and one of them will be at your office door waiting, some morning, when you come. Before you get through with him you will have a land trial in the Circuit Court, as well as the criminal proceedings in Oyer and Terminer. Charge moderately, study hard, throw yourself on the weak points of your opponent, and soon you will be one of the foremost at the bar.

So the young physician. He has his pill boxes all ready; he can write a prescription as undecipherable by laymen as though an old physician had written it; has sawed off arms and legs in the dissecting-room; and yet no patient. He has worn out his first horse by rapid riding in pretence of sick people who must see him immediately, and sent his name to the pulpit of the village several times saying that a messenger at the door would like his professional service forthwith; yet no patients. Courage! for some time to come the world will have enough disorders to keep the doctors busy.

In a word, let all young ministers, doctors, lawyers, mechanics and farmers keep hopeful. There is a work just suited to you somewhere. God never makes one blade of a scissors without reference to some other blade, nor a wheel with cogs unless there be some other wheel with cogs to fit it. There is an occupation just adapted to your body, mind and soul, and you and it will join harmoniously. Plenty of room for honest and earnest men. The world is not yet half finished or cured. There is work for us all to do. Let us do it.

MINISTERIAL DRESS.

THERE seems to be a great variety of opinion as to what ministers ought to wear. There is much caricature of white cravat, and coat with buttons clear up to the top, and black kid gloves on ordinary occasions. Others advocate these peculiarities of clerical dress, and do not like to see preachers walking about with coat and cravat and manners like other people. It is said that there ought to be something to distinguish them from men of other occupations, and that then they would be more highly respected for their office. We cannot see the force of either side of this argument. Our feeling is, let every minister dress as his taste dictates. We do not see why ministers have not the right to as much liberty in matters of apparel as men of other professions. If the clergyman desire a white cravat, and so many buttons on straight-cut coat and vest, that it may seem to settle forever the long-disputed question of the nursery: "Button, button, who has the button?" we cannot see any objections. Certainly no question of righteousness can be involved if he have paid for the buttons. On the contrary, we think that a soft hat and sack coat and white pants, if the weather be hot, are just as allowable. No doubt the Pharisee had all the habiliments of propriety; but the Publican came out ahead of him. We deny the right of any one to tell us what we shall wear. We shall not forget the dolorous countenance of a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, who once labored with us very seriously for the offence of side whiskers, saying he thought it might cripple our influence. But he himself has since lost his integrity, and now wears a mustache. Dear us! If side whiskers are a sin, at what bad place must that man come to who wears into the pulpit, in sight of all the people, a mustache? While we never wore a white cravat but three days in our life, and that made out of a handkerchief tied around the boil on our neck, we co tend for the right of ministers to an independent wardrobe.

YATMAN'S COLUMN

GOOD WOMEN.

WHAT is the duty of a wife, or rather what are her duties? I answer, to live for her husband, home and heaven. Faithfulness here, will bring a sure reward. It is to bear and forbear; it is to let love work out love's fulfilment. To be as true when it's "for worse," as when it's "for better." To be as careful in dress and manner after marriage as before. Many a woman had the roses at her bosom or belt before marriage, who never thinks of it now; many a woman has grown careless, both in manners and person, thereby weakening her hold upon him, her companion. God pity the man who does not love his wife better, and find more enjoyment in her society twenty years after marriage, than on the day when he led her to the altar.

Some wives are so unwise as to let the children come in between husband and self. Some will make great efforts to arrange nice things, dainty dishes, clean linen for company; but never bother when only husband is to be at home. Foolish women! let the best you have be given unto him.

Wives must be careful, and keep the confidence of their husbands. A man will trust his wife with anything and everything, if she is true and is tactful. Their joys should be mutual, their secrets mutual; little things which belong only to husband and wife. She should be ready and able to help him, when the heavy loads come, to be pulled up high hills. Her gentleness, her love, her wise caresses; her tact when to speak and when not to, will make him twice a man in his life and business. Let her be all that woman was to her husband, in New York on that awful "Black Friday," when the financial crash came and ruined thousands.

This man bade his wife and children good-bye, and passed from a costly home up-town, to Wall Street, that memorable morning. The hours passed: many had already gone under; more than once it seemed as if he, too, must sink, but more securities brought out, saved him; then again the close push to the wall, and more securities. At last, to save himself and his creditors, he put his name to paper, covering all he owned everywhere; home and all. This tided over the doom for a little while: then came the crash, and all was swept away; and he was penniless.

Rumors had reached his good wife; more than once she went to the window and wistfully looked out. At last she saw him coming; she could tell by his face there was trouble. Opening the door for him, she saw the white face; she heard his bitter cry:—

"It's all gone, wife, all gone! Not a cent left; home gone too; all gone."

Then came the help of a heroic wife.

"No, no, husband, all is not gone. I'm not gone; the children are not gone, and God is not gone."

And she led him like a child into the parlor where he cried only as a man can cry.

"Don't cry, dear, its all right; we can find a place to live. I could get along in two rooms; and I'd rather live with you there, and have you honest, than to live here and owe people. And I can teach music if necessary. Don't cry.

"Husband, you are a good man, you have helped God's cause in a thousand ways. You have not spared when he called; and now when you are in trouble, I don't believe he is going to desert you." And she dropped on her knees in front of him, and began to pour out her heart to God. Such a prayer! it had a double mission: it reached the throne in heaven, and it reached him. Bending over, he kissed her and said,

"Oh, Mary, God will hear your cry, I know he will, I know he will. He will help." And courage came back in his heart, and lo! the outcome. In a strange manner friends came to his relief; lent him money on his own name; helped him regain his feet in the financial world; and the result was, he paid dime for dime, dollar for dollar; and does not need moved from their home on the avenue, for God sent help in answer to that cry that day.

Such a woman is better than an angel to help a man. He finds more enjoyment in her company, than in all the clubs born. Men love women like that, and love them forever.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A LUSHAI RESIDENCE.

STRANGE accounts of life and customs have been recently sent home by an officer attached to the expedition now in the Lushai country. It is a region lying between India and Burmah to the northeast of the Bay of Bengal. The Lushai tribes with their neighbors, the Chins, have been making incursions into India for the purposes of robbery, and it was necessary to send a force to punish them and compel them to pay indemnities. The expedition had to proceed in boats up the Karnaphulli River to Demegri, where a landing was made, and the troops marched through a dense forest to the Lushai country. They found the people little better than savages. The houses in which they live are made of matting and are raised on poles above the ground. The villages are filthy in the extreme, and dogs, pigs and rats swarm everywhere. The people are dirty and lazy and spend much of their time under the influence of an ixtoxicating liquor, called zu, which they distil from rice. Their principal chief, to whom the commander of the expedition was referred, was an elderly man named Lalluova. He came to the interview dressed in an old swallow-tail coat and a tall hat that had once been white. With a long pipe at his mouth and a pot of zu by his side, he listened to the complaints of the officer and affected much surprise at his story. He professed to know nothing of the raids which his people had made on Indian territory and was profuse in his promises to prevent them in future. It was evident that his authority over the people was very slight, but from the reports current among them it appeared that on occasions he would shake off his laziness and mete out savage punishment in a capricious manner. It is evident that life in the Lushai conntry is of a most degraded type and that the land is one of those which prove the truth of the Psalmist's assertion that "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." (Ps. 74:20.)

A Bride in Pawn.

THE proprietor of a hotel at New Brunswick, N. J., adopted a novel method of collecting a bill recently. Four persons came to his house on March 17, and asked for rooms. They were accommodated and remained until night. Then one of the party, a young man, had an interview with the landlord and in an embarrassed way told him that it was a wedding party. He wanted to be married to one of the two ladies and would be glad if the landlord would secure the services of a minister. The landlord sent around to his own clergyman, who responded and performed the marriage ceremony in the hotel. The next morning, he inquired from the clergyman if he had received a good fee and was informed that the bridegroom had excused himself from paying any fee, bnt had promised to remit when he returned home. The information made the hotel-man uneasy on his own account and he immediately sent up his bill with a request for payment. He learned that both the young men had departed, leaving the bride and bridesmaid behind. The two women proposed leaving, too, to look for the young men, but the landlord objected to their going until his bill was paid. The plan, however, did not succeed. The bride had evidently no money and the bridegroom did not come to redeem her, so the hotel keeper allowed her to depart. She must have felt deeply mortified by her situation. That her husband should have borne to be separated from her when he could have had her with him by the payment of so small a sum of money, indicated either his abject poverty or his indifference to her. A greater contrast cannot be easily imagined than in the treatment by Christ of the church, which is his bride, and which he redeemed by his precious blood. (Rev. 5:9.)

A Farmer's Stone Coffin.

AN aged farmer of Madison County, Kentucky, gave an order a few days ago to a stonemason which astonished him. The old gentleman is very wealthy, but has not been remarkable for eccentricity. This order, however, did appear eccentric, for it was for a regular sarcophagus. He wanted it made of Kentucky limestone, a quarry of which was on his own estate. He was very precise as to the measurements and had a drawing of the design for outside ornament. The order was taken and is being executed. When complete, the coffin will weigh fifteen hundred pounds. His reason for adopting this now novel mode of sepulture, is that the country around his home is overrun with polecats, minks and groundhogs, and he believes that the only way to keep them from devouring his body is to have it enclosed in a stone coffin. It may be hoped that he has not limited his precaution to his body. His soul will need protection against an enemy who "as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." (1 Peter 5:8.)

An Abandoned Child.

A STRANGE trust has been confided to a lady living at Elizabethport, N. J. On March 14, just as she was retiring to rest she heard a timid ring at her door-bell. She unfastened the door, which had been secured for the night, but no one was there. On the stoop, however, was an old-fashioned valise. Taking this into the house she noticed that both ends of it had been cut out. On opening it, to her amazement, she saw a beautiful girl baby about a month old. It was well dressed and a bundle of clothing and some money lay beside it. There was also a closed can of condensed milk apparently placed there as a hint to her of the best kind of nourishment for the child. An explanatory letter was also in the valise. It stated that the writer was the mother of the babe. She and her husband, the letter said, were of opposite religious beliefs; they had been quarreling on the subject of creed ever since their marriage and the birth of the baby had intensified the strife, as they could not agree as to how she should be brought up. They had determined to separate, and, not knowing what to do with the child they had decided to commit it to the care of this lady who is well-known for her kindliness and philanthropic spirit. The lady has accepted the charge and will bring the child up as her own. Probably the child will be better cared for so than by its own parents, but it is a sad and unnatural arrangement. One would have thought that, though there were differences in the creeds of the parents, there would have been enough in common to enable them to fulfil parental duties. But it is only an illustration of a common sectional spirt. The sects are so much occupied in contention over minute questions of doctrine and ritual that they are apt to neglect the duty of preaching Gospel to the heathen at home and abroad. (Titus 3:8, 9.)

He Proved Too Much.

A DISAPPOINTED lawyer is living in Macon, Ga. He was recently summoned to the city prison by a man who was charged with attempting murder. The case was a very serious one; as the victim had been so brutally assaulted, that for several weeks he lay at the point of death. There was no question as to the identity of the perpetrator of the deed, and the lawyer had therefore a difficult case to defend. After a thorough study of it, he concluded that the only way to save his client was to plead insanity. He worked hard and made a brilliant defence, supported by medical evidence and the testimony of friends of the prisoner, whom he carefully instructed as to the facts they should emphasize on the stand. He spent an unusual quantity of time and labor on the case and eventually secured a verdict declaring the prisoner insane at the time he committed the crime. The man was sent to the asylum, and the lawyer congratulated himself on his success. He had taken the precaution to secure a good fee before the trial. The prisoner had no money, but he owned an eligible building lot in the suburbs of the city, and this he deeded to the lawyer as his fee. When the trial was over, the lawyer put the land on the market, but was surprised to learn from the lawyer of an intending purchaser, that the title was not good. The fatal defect was that the deed under which he held, was signed by a man whom the courts had pronounced insane, and, therefore, incompetent to dispose of his property. The lawyer cannot gainsay the fact which he was at so much pains to establish, and he is consequently liable to lose his fee. Some of our theologians are likely to find themselves similarly caught in a snare of their own making. If the time should come when they need to get from the Bible the comfort and support that their fathers obtained from it in trouble and sickness and death, they will regret their success in proving that it is not inerrant. (Prov. 11:19.)

A Repentant Patriot.

A remarkable confession was made recently to a visitor by Arabi Pasha, the Egyptian patriot. Arabi is now living in Ceylon, whither he was exiled after his downfall. Some twelve years ago he was the most powerful man in Egypt. He headed a rebellion, which was nominally against his sovereign, the Khedive, but which Arabi insisted was really on the Khedive's behalf. He wanted, he said, to deliver the Khedive from foreign domination, and to preserve Egypt for the Egyptians. He made a brave and desperate fight, but was beaten, and has since then been living in retirement in his Cingalese home. It appears that he has kept up a correspondence with his friends in Egypt, and has been a careful reader of the newspapers. He said pathetically that he had nothing else to do, now. His interest in Egyptian affairs, and his love for his country is as intense as ever. To his visitor, whose letter is published by the New York Tribune, he declared that his whole life had been a mistake. He regretted opposing the English occupation, for he found that the English had done for Egypt what he had hoped to do, but could never have succeeded in doing. "Not one of her own sons," said Arabi, "could have given Egypt the relief from oppression and injustice and the good government that she enjoys now. All that I fought for, and struggled to attain, is accomplished. In my blindness I was resisting the surest means of achieving my own aims. I was not fighting for ambitious ends, but for the liberation of my country. I am sorry, now, that I did so, and am glad for my country's sake that I was defeated." It was strange, said the visitor, to hear this once powerful leader making the manly confession of error, and avowing his satisfaction in the success of his opponents. It is a similar confession that every sinner has to make when he becomes reconciled to God. He finds that he was resisting his best Friend, and that as a servant of God he is happier and more useful than when he was his own master. "The way of man is not in himself; it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps" (Jer. 10.23.)

INTERIOR OF A HUT IN THE LUSHAI COUNTRY, INDIA.

BRIEF NOTES.

Major Whittle, Miss Whittle and Mr. Stebbins have been holding revival services at Arklow, Ireland, with much success.

Rev. B. Fay Mills began his meetings at Minneapolis, March 8, with crowded houses and with evidences of hearty co-operation on the part of ministers and churches.

Dr. Thomas E. Vermilye of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church is dead. He was the oldest minister in New York having attained his ninety-first year. He was pastor of the old church in Vandewater Street in 1825.

Union meetings have been commenced at Lockport, N. Y., under the charge of the pastors of the town. No evangelist has been invited, but the meetings are of decided evangelistic character.

Countess Li, wife of the Chinese Statesman, Li Hung Chang, is dead. At one time she was cured of a malady by a medical missionary, and in gratitude built an hospital for the missionary, equipping it and paying expenses from her own purse, she also protected Christians.

Evangelist C. S. Mason has been much blessed in his services at Port Townsend, Wash. Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians have united in the work and many souls have been won. All three denominations have received additions to their membership, and there are many inquirers, especially among young men.

Rev. J. P. MacPhie, Pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Meridian, N. Y., had the pleasure of receiving fifty converts into church membership on one Sunday lately. They were the first fruits of the revival services held under the leadership of Rev. E. E. Davidson. Many others are waiting to join.

The Floating Bethel of the Brooklyn City Mission was formally dedicated on Sunday, March 12. It is intended to anchor the boat for the present in the East River at the foot of Joralemon St. The boat will accommodate about 250 persons. Captain Hiram L. Meeker, who is in charge, has been the largest contributor toward the purchase.

Tuskegee, Ala., in the centre of "the Black Belt" has now an an excellent training school for colored ministers and Christian workers. It is modelled on Mr. Moody's Bible Institute of Chicago. The building which was dedicated March 9, is the gift of Miss O. E. P. Stokes of New York. Dr. Lyman Abbott of Brooklyn, who suggested the idea of the Institute presided at the dedicatory exercises.

Complaints are made that telegrams from missionaries in Turkey to the United States are stopped by the Sultan's government. The American Board has laid the complaints before the State Department, and last week a deputation from the Board went to Washington to have an interview with Mr. Gresham on the subject. It is stated that our minister at Constantinople has already had occasion to complain on his own account.

We regret to learn that the Rev. George C. Needham is again prostrated by severe illness and has been peremptorily ordered by his physicians to abstain from all work, both speaking and writing, for six moths. He has been compelled to cancel all engagements and will rest until October. The trouble is due to weakness of the heart, resulting from thirty years of incessant toil.

Rev. C. H. Yatman had the pleasure on March 19 of welcoming a Jewish rabbi, who desired to make profession of his faith in Christ, as a result of the Forward Movement meetings which Mr. Yatman is holding in the city. Larger accommodation is needed for both the Sunday and week-evening meetings, and the committee is seeking suitable quarters. Extensive preparations are being made for the summer work.

The People's Tabernacle at Spokane, Wash., is doing a much needed work in that city. From a report sent to us by Mr. David Klopton, it appears that Lieut. Lavery, who is in charge of the Institution, has carried it through the first three months of its existence at a total cost of less than a thousand dollars. Philanthropic and evangelistic work are combined in its sphere of operations and Christianity has been made the helpful agency for body as well as soul which it was intended to be.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings in Muscatine, Iowa, are being greatly blessed. The News-Tribune of that city says that never was such a scene witnessed there as that of March 12, when at the Young People's meeting in the Congregational Church and at the Adults' meeting in the Methodist Church, the people rose to ask for prayer in response to the evangelist's invitation. At the two meetings, 175 cards were handed in, signed by persons who expressed their desire to lead a Christian life.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. John 11: 1-54.

THERE are, as we have seen, three recorded raisings from the dead by our Lord during his public ministry; there are also several hints showing that there may have been many unrecorded raisings from the dead. Having discussed the first two, that of the daughter of Jairus, and that of the son of the widow of Nain, we are now prepared to consider the third case, that of Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary. This miracle is the most stupendous one ever performed by our Lord. It is recorded, however, only by the evangelist John. Matthew, Mark and Luke pass over it without a word of record and without a hint or suggestion. Why was this miracle omitted by the three earlier evangelists? Its omission by Luke is especially remarkable, because he was so diligent in securing and selecting the materials for his gospel. Many answers have been given to the question as to why the writers of the synoptic gospels made this omission. Some have said that at the time of the writing of their gospels the family of Lazarus may have been living, and the giving of this account might have subjected them to persecution and possibly to death. We know that John wrote later than they, and that he probably wrote at Ephesus, outside of Palestine. Consequently the danger of exposing the friends of Lazarus to persecution cannot have existed in his time. But this answer is entirely unsatisfactory. We cannot suppose that Lazarus would shrink from enduring persecution, or would in any way deny the Lord who had called him back from the grave. It has also been said that the three earlier evangelists recorded miracles which occurred, for the most part, in Galilee, except that Luke relates the Perean ministry, while John confines himself to those which occurred in Judæa. This statement is true, but it does not answer the question; it only pushes it further back. It is only stating in other words the fact which we are endeavoring to explain. Still others have said that the number of miracles performed by Christ was so large that all could not be recorded. This statement also is correct. John himself teaches us that the world itself would not contain the record of all that Jesus said and did, but it is difficult to suggest any principle of selection which would warrant the retention of less important miracles and which would exclude the account of the greatest of all miracles, especially as this miracle led to the conflicts which ended in the death of Jesus. But we know that the Holy Ghost guided each evangelist to select out of the materials at his hand those which were best fitted to the special purpose for which each wrote. There was marked appropriateness, therefore, in having this record made by John rather than by any of the other evangelists. His special object was to prove the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. In the opening verse of his gospel he gives us the proposition, which he intends to prove and to emphasize—"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." The whole trend of his gospel goes to prove this fundamental proposition. Near the close he affirms that what he wrote was written that men might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. It was fitting that he should present this tender picture of holy sympathy, this beautiful illustration of family life and love, as seen in Christ's relation to a noble family, and to a godly home. It was eminently appropriate that John, who speaks of Christ as the Light and the Life of men, should present him to us as the giver of life to one whom he loved and with whom he often sojourned. The miracle of raising Lazarus more than any other proved Christ's divinity, and thus was admirably adapted to the purpose of the evangelist John.

It is a narrative which abounds in minute touches of great beauty and tenderness, and a narrative whose silences are as voiceful, if we listen well, as are its voices themselves. It is a story of touching kindliness and of matchless beauty. Thousands upon thousands have read it with suffused eyes and with throbbing hearts. They have also received unspeakable comfort from the divine sympathy here shown. Our Lord's love as here manifested is as discriminating as it is tender; for Lazarus seems to have been an only brother, and the hearts of his sisters clung to him with peculiar fondness. He seems also to have been the youngest of the family. We behold then the wonderful compassion of Christ's loving heart; and the sweetness and blessedness of his divine-human sympathy.

It was important in writing the life of Christ that an example of his dealing with a household in deep grief should be given. Had there been an omission of these tender touches the picture of his life would have been incomplete, and the force of his example would have been greatly weakened. There is no duty which comes to a minister of Christ that more taxes his resources and more tests his skill, no duty which requires more delicate tact or sanctified sense than dealing with families in sorrow. I have often felt my utter incompetency in going to homes stricken with grief; and I never feel my need of divine help more than when I am called upon to minister to those whose hopes are blighted and whose hearts are nearly broken. The example of Christ then in this case is greatly helpful to all ministers of Christ and workers for souls.

In these three raisings from the dead we have proofs of Christ's power over death and the grave. He came into personal contact with the great destroyer and vanquished him in every case. He rescued the victims of death from his giant grasp, and restored them in life and health to their families. Humanly speaking, as we shall later see, there is an ascending scale of difficulty in these three cases; but Christ proved himself able to snatch from the grave as truly as from the bier or the bed.

For a moment we have a glimpse of the beautiful home and the blessed family life in Bethany. This was a home which Jesus loved and to which he often repaired. Here a glad welcome was given him by these two sisters and their noble brother. Not only in their homes but also in their hearts was this joyous reception given to the divine Lord. When weary with the conflicts of foes in Jerusalem Jesus was often glad to cross the mountain and to find welcome, peace, and rest in this happy dwelling. It is delightful for us to think of the family life there enjoyed. He loved both the sisters and the brother with a peculiarly tender and genuinely divine and human affection. Beautifully is this brought out in two verses in the chapter which we are studying; beautiful also is the distinction between his love for Lazarus and that for the two sisters emphasized. In the third verse is described as that of human friendship, but in the fifth verse where the sisters are joined with their brother as objects of his affection we have a word which suggests regard and esteem rather than affection and love as in the first instance; the latter suggests divine love rather than human friendship. The nearness of Bethany to Jerusalem made it easy for our Lord frequently to visit this home and to enjoy the sunshine of this family love. Mary is often represented as sitting at the Master's feet, while Martha honors her divine guest by a faithful performance of the duties of the home. But even upon this home a deep, dark cloud falls, a cloud whose silver lining does not at first appear. Those whom Christ loves most are subject like all others to the trials and bereavements incident to human experience. Jesus is now absent, probably at Bethabara beyond the Jordan; and the first thought of the sisters in their sorrow is of their absent Lord. In their need they turn to him for sympathy and help. To whom else could they go? He alone had the words of life; he alone had the heart of fullest love and greatest tenderness. Nothing can exceed the beauty and delicacy of the message which they sent to the absent Lord. They do not ask him to come; they simply state the case, "Lord, behold he whom thou lovest is sick." They are willing to leave to Christ's own judgment and affection all the results. They well know that if it is best that he should come he will come; they know that if he do not come his delay will be the result of wisdom and love;

They can Trust Him Fully;

they leave the issue entirely in his hands. Lazarus probably in the meantime had died and the sisters are alone in their grief with their dead. Could it be that that their divine Lord had deceived them? It is easy for us to imagine that these and similar questions filled their thoughts and pained their hearts. They do not then know that Christ's absence was for the purpose of giving him the opportunity of making a grander display of his power and love than his presence would have permitted. It is ever so. Christ's delays are not denials. His apparent absence is often a greater blessing than his assured presence.

He abode two days in Bethabara after the messenger had arrived. Then he determined to return to Judæa. We cannot suppose that the detention was caused by any special duties in Bethabara; but rather to afford him the opportunity of the greater display of his power in Bethany. He could, of course, have healed by a word; but his tarrying was a part of the discipline of love, and also a necessary incident in the manifestation of divine life and power. It is evermore true that is God's opportunity. Not until all the sources of comfort have failed these sisters does he come in his majestic power and in his tender affection. All things are now ready for the return journey. He utters the sublime enigma regarding the twelve hours in the day, teaching that we are safe in the performance of our duty while our day of opportunity lasts. The determination of Thomas suggests both his weakness and his bravery, his timidity and his loyalty, his pessimism and his consecration. He cannot think it possible to return to Judæa without meeting death at the hands of the Lord's enemies; but this conviction only emphasizes his determination. At that point our Lord plainly teaches that Lazarus is dead. This he knows, not because any additional news has come, but from his own divine power. He will go, however, to wake him out of this sleep, for "in the heavenly tongue" death is only "sleeping in Jesus."

We glance once more at this home in Bethany. In all probability the death of Lazarus occurred soon after the departure of the messenger. One day would be required by the messenger to go to Bethabara, a distance of twenty-five miles; two days, we are told, Jesus remained still in that place. It would then require a day for Jesus to reach Bethany, so that we have him now present on the fourth day. Doubtless Lazarus was buried according to the Jewish custom, immediately upon his death, and thus it comes to pass that he was four days in the grave, as is later affirmed. Many friends and neighbors came to comfort

this custom was common in the time of Christ. There are indications that the family was not poor, but in very comfortable circumstances. The number of their friends, therefore, would be large and of the more influential class. Martha is the first to hear of Christ's approach and the first to go out to meet him. Mary, true to her character, remains still in the house; but so soon as she hears of the Master's arrival she rises quickly and hastens to him. Both are ready to speak words of partial rebuke, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." The bitterest drop in their cup of anguish is the thought that the Lord was absent. Sorrow always makes us selfish; every man's sorrow is the greatest that has ever been. Sorrow also leads us to rebuke ourselves because we omitted this or that which might have prevented the disaster. Christ does wisely in letting the sisters speak out all that is in their hearts. We never knew a loving heart that did not voice itself after the fashion of Martha and Mary. We are almost surprised to find both the sisters expressing the same thought. Christ's reply there and then that their brother shall arise again does not give them needed comfort. Martha again at the last day, but that assurance does not fully assuage her present grief. The Lord therefore, utters his great sentence, "I am the resurrection and the life." He tells her that she need not wait for comfort to the resurrection in the future. Here and now Christ is the resurrection and the life; here and now he triumphs over death and the grave; here and now he is a living, glorious, and triumphant Redeemer. He does not simply give resurrection life; he is the resurrection and the life. He possesses it evermore in himself; he bestows it evermore upon us. There are volumes of meaning in this double title which he here assumes. This statement is the very heart of this narrative, and the glorious miracle which follows the conclusive proof of this sublime announcement There is profound comfort in the further assurance that those who believe in him shall never really die. Were ever more majestic words spoken than these which now come from the lips of the divine Christ? He stands here before the world in all the majesty and glory of his divinity. Those words have come down through all the centuries, as words of matchless sweetness and marvelous power. They have dried the tears from many eyes; they have banished sorrow from many homes. "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me though he were dead, yet shall he live." It is as if Christ had said, "I am the giver of a higher life. I am which death can never destroy. I am the giver of a hope which blossoms and blooms in the tomb. I am the giver of a life which so far from separating you from me and separating you from your brother, will but bring you closer to us both, for neither death nor life, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Knows that He will Rise

So, then, dear friends, we make a great mistake when we try to comfort mourners by simply assuring them that the dead shall "rise again." We ought to do that. We should do more. We ought to teach them that if we are united to Christ by a living faith we can never die; and we can never be separated from those we love. The grave may intervene, but faith overleaps it. Death may come; but only as the messenger to open the golden gates. Death will be God's servant, and above its voice will be the voice of Jesus, proclaiming, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Dead as to his lower life, the believer is alive as to his higher life. "And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?" said Jesus to Martha. I put it to you, each one. Believest thou this? O, man! O, woman! have you this life? Are you united to Christ by a living faith? Then you can triumph over death, you can smile at the grave, you can take up the glorious and immortal words of Paul: "O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory? But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

We now see Christ revealing himself in matchless tenderness and in exalted majesty. We see him one moment as a man, and the next moment speaking words of majesty as Deity. We do not wonder that all the spectators were astonished at Christ's tenderness, at his wonderful love for this honored family. It is not wrong to weep with those who weep? The heart is often refreshed as sorrow pours forth its tears. The thought has well been expressed, that we ought to keep the stream of sorrow within its banks, but we ought not to try entirely to stem it.

We cannot follow our Lord in detail through all these wonderful scenes; we hear the glorious the mighty, the victorious words, "Lazarus, come forth." We have already heard the same heavenly voice uttering its thanksgiving to the Father; and the same voice is heard still although with a changed tone, the tone of irresistible power, the tone of divine authority. We are not surprised to read, "He that was dead came forth." Marvellous moment, sublime victory, divine and glorious Redeemer! We here anticipate the time when "all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth." The narrative, after the method of the Holy Scripture, does not go into details; it breaks off suddenly. It tells us in a few words the effect produced upon those who beheld. Many of them believed on Jesus, but some of them went their ways to the Pharisees to report the things that Jesus had done.

The Quickener.

Standing in the midst of these stupendous events there are some lessons which we can learn. First, Christ quickens those who are spiritually dead. He alone can quicken; he alone could call back to life the daughter of the ruler, the son of the widow, and the brother of Martha and Mary. He alone can arouse and vivify those who are now dead. No human voice, unaccompanied by divine power, can reach the dull ear, and move the dead heart. I pray for that power to-day. May God Almighty accompany divine truth by divine power at this moment, and may the dead be called back to life!

Second, Christ's power can reach the most difficult cases. Dean Trench and many other writers have called attention to the fact, already suggested in this discoure, that we have an ascending scale of difficulty in these three raisings from the dead. The daughter of the ruler of the synagogue was still upon her bed; life had just left her body. The son of the widow of Nain was not upon his bed, but upon his bier; and Lazarus was not upon his bed in the house, nor upon his bier in the street; but in the grave, and he had been there so long that his sister could not bear to have his grave uncovered, but the mighty voice of Christ echoes through the chambers of death and the dead come forth in obedience thereto. Christ can rekindle the vital flame, not only when it has just been extinguished, but when nothing remains but the cold ashes. There is no case too difficult for his divine power; no soul too lost for his mighty love.

The Unloosing.

Third. Christ uses human instrumentality in performing his greatest and divinest works. Human hands could remove the stone; human hands could loose the bandages. What we can do that we must do. Christ never puts a premium on human indolence. There are stones of ignorance, stones of prejudice, stones of evil habit, which we can remove; there are bandages of many kinds which we can unloose. This work Christ commands us to do, for in doing it we shall be laborers together with him for the glory of God and for the salvation of souls.

Fourth. Christ gives liberty as well as life. There stands Lazarus, bound hand and foot. He is helpless; he cannot run in the way of duty, he cannot walk in the path of service. He is alive, but he is in bondage. He must be loosed, and human hands can loose him. All about us are men and women in whose souls are stirrings of divine life, but they are bound with bandages of traditional notions, conviction and conversion, and with traditional prejuice against public confession of Christ We must loose them. We must co-operate with God in the completed work of human redemption.

To-day, we stand beside the empty grave of Lazarus. Next Lord's day we shall behold the empty grave of Jesus. By faith we look forward to the time when the graves of the world shall be empty, and when the song of a redeemed church shall echo through earth and heaven with the triumphant words: "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!"

"TALITHA CUMI."

OUR little one was sick, and the sickness pressed her sore.
We sat beside her bed, and we felt her hands and head,
And in our hearts we prayed this one prayer
o'er and o'er:
"Come to us, Christ the Lord; utter thine old-time word,
'Talitha cumi!'"

And as the night wore on, the fever flamed more high,
And a new look burned and grew in the eyes of tender blue;
Still louder in our hearts arose the voiceless cry,
"O Lord of love and might, say once again to-night, 'Talitha cumi!'"

And then, and then—he came; we saw him not, but felt.
And he bent above the child, and she ceased to moan, and smiled;
And although we heard no sound, as around the bed we knelt,
Our souls were made aware of a mandate in the air,
"Talitha cumi!"

And as at dawn's fair summons faded the morning star,
Holding the Lord's hand close, the child we loved arose,
And with him took her way to a country far away;
And we would not call her dead, for it was his voice that said,
"Talitha cumi!"

"I WILL COME AGAIN."

JOHN 14: 3.

SOMETIMES the shadows fall across my way,
Sometimes I feel that life is almost vain,
Then I look up—then work with freshened zeal,
He whispers: "I will come again."

What matters it if all my hopes should fail?
What matter if my friends should faithless prove?
He has prepared a happy home for me,—
A wondrous mansion in the realms above.

So, on I go, not caring, where he leads,
No matter if in joy or if in pain,
My solace and my spur to noble deeds,
That whisper: "I will come again."

THE EASTER PLEDGE.

Christ's Resurrection the Basis of Hope for the Race.

BY REV. CHARLES GRAHAM.

WHILE repeatedly mentioning both resurrections at the same time, Holy Scripture emphatically makes a distinction between the resurrection of the just and of the unjust. Thus our Lord declares to the Jews: "The hour is coming in which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Paul makes the same distinction as to character when he declares before Felix that "there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." The believer is "quickened together with Christ"—that is, he has received into his soul the resurrection life of the Lord Jesus. This secures the resurrection of the body. The resurrection of Christ himself as the first-fruit is a pledge of the harvest; and "the harvest is the end of the age." "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept. The sleepers are the righteous (I. Thess. 4: 14). It is only of such Christ could be the first-fruit. The wicked shall be raised by hie power, but it will be in the end of his millennial kingdom. "For as in Adam all die. even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruit, afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the Kingdom to God, even the Father."

The selective character and distinctiveness of the resurrection of the righteous is evident from the fact of its depending on moral fitness. Our blessed Lord declares: "They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more, for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Their title to this resurrection "from the dead" is that they are children of God (Luke 20: 35, 36). This was the end for which Paul lived and labored, that he might attain to the resurrection from (or from among) the dead.

Again, we notice that as Christ risen is the pledge of our resurrection, so also is the Holy Spirit dwelling in us. In this respect the Spirit in us, as well as Christ at God's right hand, is the first-fruit of resurrection. The whole creation, Paul tells us, groans, though unintelligently. for deliverance. "And not only they, but ourselves also, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption—to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. 8: 23).

In Holy Scriptures the coming of the Lord to set up his kingdom and the resurrection of his people are inseparably connected. "Our conversation [citizenship] is in heaven, whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change the body of our humiliation, that it might be fashioned like unto his most glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself" (Phil. 3: 20, 21).

The Scriptures are clearly against the view of those who look for a spiritual, not personal, reign of Christ, who teach that there will be no resurrection of the dead until after the Millennium. In the Millennial Kingdom, as we have seen, Christ will reign until he shall have put all enemies under his feet. Then as the man Christ Jesus, he will deliver up the kingdom to God the Father, and God will be all in all. Will it be when he has delivered up the kingdom that he will come to raise his sleeping saints and change the living ones? Shall we begin to reign with him only when he has delivered up his kingdom? Or will he reign in a glorified body and his saints in a disembodied state, reign with him?—that is, shall they reign while death reigns over them? Shall the apostles sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel while death will hold their bodies in the grave? Nay, nay; Dan. 3 shows us that when Christ takes the kingdom the saints will take it with him, and they will not take it disembodied. The very advent of Christ will be to give them victory over death, and enable them to sing, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

In Rev. 20: 4, John sees the martyrs living and reigning with Christ. They are kings and priests unto God. The resurrection of the unjust will be to condemnation, to shame, and to everlasting contempt. They shall go away to everlasting punishment; they shall be cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death. In the prospect of the end of all things being at hand, how ought we to live that we may be found by the Lord without spot and blameless at his appearing?

DELIVERANCE IN TROUBLE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 9. Job 5: 19-22. II Cor. 12: 9, 10.

MAN'S universal need is for a deliverer in time of trouble. Every one has been in trouble and those who have escaped the troubles that come from without, usually prepare an artificial trouble, quite as hard to bear as the real thing. They are of many kinds, business troubles, family troubles, spiritual troubles, troubles of bereavement, of sickness and of poverty. Physicians and lawyers and clergymen spend much of their time in delivering people out of trouble; but man's great need is for one universal deliverer to whom he can go and find relief in any emergency. Eliphaz the Temanite pointed Job to such a Deliverer but his words proved how little he knew of him. He was wrong in the particular case to which he attempted to minister and modern experience has proved him to be in error again and again. God is represented as being displeased with the character Eliphaz and his friends drew as being his, and he repudiated it. There are some troubles from which he does not deliver, and from which it would not be well for us that he should deliver. Paul's case, which is described in the second passage chosen to illustrate the topic, is a case in point. The crude view taken by Eliphaz was falsified in Paul's experience. The Apostle found a refuge and a support in God but not a Deliverer. God had permitted the trouble for a wise and useful purpose and though Paul recognized it as a messenger from Satan and smarted under it, he came to understand that God acquiesced in it. His appeal for relief was rejected, but he gained something better than relief in an accession of strength which he used in other emergencies. God deals so with all his trusting children. It is so the wise father deals with his children. He wishes them to become strong and patient and self-reliant and knows that it is better they should grapple with difficulties and overcome them than that they should expect him to relieve them. So, when the child of God is in [illegible] often apparently deaf to his prayers and the trouble remains to harass and distress him. South Sea Island Homes.

Once Savage and Cannibal, but now through Christianity made Peaceful and Happy—King George's Remarkable Career.

WHAT the Gospel has done in the past and may still be expected to do in the future for the savage races of the earth, is strikingly illustrated in the history of the Tonga nation, a brief account of whose late monarch, King George, was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD two weeks ago. The Tongas are a group of islands in the South Pacific Ocean, which were first discovered by Tasman, the explorer in 1643. Captain Cook gave them the name of Friendly Islands, but they are now generally known as the Tongas, after the name of the principal island of the group, Tongatabu.

Much less than a century ago, the Tongas were cannibals," and infanticide and other crimes peculiar to savage peoples were everywhere prevalent. Their ruler was a ferocious young savage, whose nature is sufficiently disclosed in the fact, that in 1806, he led an attack on a French whaling vessel, the Port-au-Prince, and directed the massacre of her entire crew, with one exception.

In 1824, two devoted Wesleyan missionaries, Messrs. Hutchinson and Thomas, labored in the Tonga group, where they soon succeeded in collecting the people to hear the Gospel, and in establishing schools for the instruction of the children. Shortly afterwards several of the chiefs renounced idolatry. Messages were also received from the chiefs of the Vavue and Haapai Islands, requesting missionaries. In 1830, Mr. Thomas proceeded to Lefuga, the chief island of the Haapai group, and found that King Taufaahau, who had previously visited the Tonga Islands, had renounced idolatry; and not only so, but had proceeded to the other islands in his group and endeavored to persuade his people to follow his example, and in fourteen out of the eighteen islands the people expressed their willingness to accept Christian teachers. The king had been baptized, and had adopted the name of George Tubou, in token of his new faith. At one place the chiefs were indignant at the acts of the king, and determined to celebrate a great festival in honor of the gods. The king, however, received an intimation of this, and drove a large herd of pigs into the sacred enclosure, converted the temple into a sleeping apartment for his servants, and suspended the images of the gods to the rafters of his house. When the priests came to sacrifice, they were astonished, but thought it best to take it quietly.

The king had often exhorted the chief of the Vavue group of islands to turn to God, but for a long time without success. At last, however, in answer to King George's earnest entreaties, he said he would spend one Sabbath with him in worship. This was the turning-point of his life, and from that day he set his mind to the destruction of his idols and soon both he and his people avowed themselves Christians.

During the year 1834, a remarkable religious movement began in Vavue, and quickly extended to the whole of the Haapai group of islands nearby, and afterward to the Tongas. Polygamy was abandoned; the Sabbath was strictly observed; and daily and family prayers became the common practice of the converts. In less than a month 2,262 persons joined the mission.

King George, who became ruler, both of the Haapai and Vavue groups in 1833, entered heart and soul into the work. He and his Queen met classes and superintended schools, while he became a local preacher, and fulfilled his appointments with the greatest cheerfulness. He also liberated his slaves, giving them words of exhortation and advice, till the whole of them, the king and queen included, wept aloud. Their missionary zeal was also aroused, and they greatly helped in planting the standard of the cross on the Fiji Islands and several other places. It was through his personal influence that the late King Cakobau of Fiji was converted and induced to abandon cannibalism.

Although the king had become a Christian with many of his people, there still survived among the Tongas a strong heathen element, which occasionally gave trouble. In 1840, a number of native Christians were murdered in their homes, and for a time the mission work was seriously hindered. Good came out of it all, however, for the result was that the entire group of islands was placed under the rule of the Christian king, and all the Friendly Islands were soon in pleasant union, under the influence of the Gospel. Happy days followed for the people of Tonga! Homes sprang up everywhere, and, little villages and communities multiplied. The sound of church bells and the sweet music of children's voices took the place of the loud, heathen orgies and the voudoo worship of other days. King George convened a parliament and good laws were enacted; frequent religious festivals were held, at which much love and zeal were displayed for the Gospel, and many heathen were brought into the fold. Twelve years ago, the king established a Free Church of Tonga, and appointed the Rev. Shirley Baker as his Prime Minister. The latter continued in office until 1890.

Child Book Lovers.

"I do not think it is very serviceable," writes Charles Dudley Warner, "to make a list of books for children to read. No two have exactly the same aptitudes, tastes, or kinds of curiosity about the world. I knew a boy, a scrap of a lad, who almost needed a high chair to bring him up to the general level of the dining-table, who liked to read the encyclopædia. He was always hunting round in the big books of the encyclopædia—books about his own size—for what he wanted to know. He dug in it as another boy would dig in the woods for sassafras root. It appeared that he was interested in natural history and natural phenomena. He asked questions of these books, exactly as he would ask a living authority, and kept at it until he got answers. He knew how to read. Soon that boy was an authority on earthquakes. From that he went on to try to discover what caused these disturbances, and this led him into other investigations, and at last into electricity, practical as well as theoretical. He examined machines and invented machines, and kept on reading, and presently he was an expert in electricity. He knew how to put in wires, and signals and bells, and to do a number of practical and useful things, and almost before he was able to enter high-school he had a great deal of work to do in the city, and three or four men under him. These men under him had not read as much about electricity as he had."

It is so in spiritual things, also. The child who has been trained to love the Lord, will take delight in reading the Word, and by persistent waiting upon him, attain such a development in the spiritual life that the world will accord him the authority and position of one who lives "near to God."

The Armchair in the Home.

WHAT a flood of pleasant memories is awakened by the sight of the old armchair in the home of our childhood! Blessed is the household that has such an armchair.

A figure is in my mind, says a reverend writer, the figure of an old lady whose hair is as white as snowdrift. What storms have passed over that whitened head, I wonder! Along what thorny paths has she been compelled to go! Doubtless troubles have closed around her many times, until it seemed that that there was no way of escape; but she was led on, step by step, and there was always the pillar of cloud by day or fire by night. She has come past all the thorny ways at last, and rests on the shores of the placid river. "What a lovely face!" is the cry of every one who sees her, and people turn and look after her lingeringly. "What a lovely face!" Blessed is the household that has an armchair in it. Put the armchair in the cheeriest corner. Let light and pleasant conversation and general laughter be about it. If you have cares, keep them to yourself. The trembling form that sits in the armchair has borne the burden for a long time, and now has the right to lay it down. Some day there will be no use for the old chair. The snowy hair will be smoothed down for the last time; the wrinkled face will settle into profound repose. Keep smiles and sunny warmth for trembling old age while it is here.

Carrying the Lambs.

WHEN the shepherd carries the lambs in his bosom, he has little difficulty about leading the sheep. The women on whose little children the Saviour laid his hands in blessing did not deny, or reject, or betray, or crucify their friend. They ministered to him in life, they followed weeping as he went out to suffer, they were "last at his cross, and earliest at his grave."

He who grasps the key of childhood opens the doors of the home. Said a godly mother in parting from her son as he was leaving home to enter upon the ministry of the Gospel:

"Others may tell you more in knowledge, but let me impress one thing upon you. Every time you lay your hands upon a child's head, you lay it upon his mother's heart."

There is a lesson here for the proud, the self-conceited, the austere to learn, "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones."

Well-Ordered Lives.

THE methodical man is never in a hurry. He moves along in his orbit, as Goethe says the stars do, "without haste and without rest." He knows what is first to be done, what next, and how long each item to be attended to will require. He sees in an exigency what can be omitted or deferred, and what must be done according to the programme he has made. If he is due at a certain train, he is there on time, with five or ten minutes to spare. If a certain task is to be done by a certain date, the work is ready a little in advance of the date. All this comes of a habit of forecasting, planning out, of working daily according to a settled programme, of allowing of each tick of the pendulum a second to tick in.

Some housekeepers are always in a hurry about breakfast or dinner, or getting to church, or having their sewing done, or making calls, or something else; and they do not realize that hurry is in their state of mind, is within them, and not caused by circumstances outside of them.

"IN THE SEVENTIES."

FROM an aged friend in Chicago, comes a letter in which she thus freely unburdens her heart:

"I have come to the last hour of my 69th year and I want to tell you that I do believe your sermon 'Threescore and Ten' in the last CHRISTIAN HERALD, was divinely appointed for my special benefit, and I accept your congratulations, as I enter upon my 70th year, with great pleasure. To think that I have gotten so nearly through with the vicissitudes of life is a joy to me, like one upon a long tiresome journey, glad to be be nearing the end. 'Are we almost there?' said a dying girl, as she was nearing the homeland after an ocean voyage in vain search of health.

"I often think, 'Are we almost there?' and, like Paul, am in a strait betwixt two opinions—desiring to depart and be forever with the Lord—nevertheless it seems needful to abide still in the flesh. I am feeling the weight of these 60 years very much. What must the lonely summit of fourscore be, when the summit of 70 is so lonely to me?

"It is a sadness unspeakable to me to think I can never hear another sermon or lecture—thankful for what I have heard—I often urge the text, 'Faith comes by hearing' and I tell folks they never will get the faith to save them by staying home and reading Sunday newspapers. I wish you would speak a message for me to those who have ears to hear and heed not the Gospel. The time may come when they cannot hear if they would. All my life I have been a church-goer and an attentive hearer, and I am so thankful for it now. I used to like so much to go to conventions and associations, missionary and temperance, and I am shut in now and take my sermons from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in cold type, lying in my bed while others are at church.

'Tis a blessing to live, but a gain to die,
And the best of this world is its path to the sky,
Be it gloomy or bright, for the life that He gave,
Let us thank Him—but blessed be God for the grave!
'Tis the end of our toil—'tis the crown of our bliss—
'Tis the portal of happiness, aye, but for this
How hopeless were sorrow, how cheerless were love
If they looked not from earth to a rapture above.'

"We have long since passed our nooning at the half-way house, my husband and I, and are waiting for the sunset glow that lights up the evening sky till we can almost see the new Jerusalem:

Where waiteth many a well-known face,
Where none are poor or sick or lone—
And as we think of all we knew
Who there have met to part no more—
Our longing hearts desire home, too.
With all the strife and trouble o'er,
So poor the world now they have gone.
We scarcely bear to think upon
The years before our rest is won.

"This is Sunday eve, March 12th, my 70th birthday anniversary. Please accept these little lines with my best wishes for temporal and spiritual good." M. M. L.

Influence of a Mother's Prayers.

THE mother of Rev. Archibald G. Brown of England, died on Feb. 10. He thus referred to the event in a recent sermon on Prov. 31: 28: My mother's father, that is, my grandfather, dear old Job Heath, a member of a family that for two hundred years belonged to the Baptist body in London, came of age in the year 1802. He was thus blessed by his mother; and then my own precious mother in her girlhood, and under the holy influence of that home, found peace in the Lord Jesus Christ, and confessed his name. She lived a life of prayer.

"After my father went to business in the morning, my mother always went upstairs, and I would not see her for some little while. I could hear her praying, and praying for her children by name, one after another, for in those days she always prayed aloud. There was never a day in which she did not have that time alone with her Lord, to spread the cases of her children before him. I never heard her speak one angry word—never once."

CHAPTER IV.

A PLOT AND HOW IT FAILED

PHILIP EMBURY turned from his daily labor, and being quick to read the evidence of the calm, grey eyes, noted the eloquent look of high purpose and settled strength that sat on Brave Barbara's expressive face. He felt also that something had come to the atmosphere of home which was scarcely to be understood

"Barbara," said he at last, after the evening meal was over, "is there anything amiss? Your countenance is sad, and yet the light in your eyes hath waxed brighter as if a fire was newly kindled. What is it, sister?"

It was characteristic of this remarkable woman, whose gentleness of spirit fully matched her strength of principle and devotion to duty, that before answering Philip's question, she went across the room to the place where Mary was sitting, and kissed her warmly on either cheek. As she retired, her young friend felt that a tear from Barbara's cheek had fallen on her hand, and she knew that whatever she might say to her Philip, love and duty were at the bottom of it all.

Standing before the curious and somewhat anxious Embury, Barbara felt that her strong message to her spiritual leader and pastor, her dear and valued friend, must come with a spurt, if it had to come at all.

"Philip!" she said firmly, "the ark of the Lord is in danger! You must preach Christ to us; or we shall all drift to hell together, and God will require our blood at your hand!"

The arrow was sped; the bolt was shot; the fair, but determined archer, had concentrated all her moral muscle, all her keen decisiveness of aim and purpose in one sentence. He looked steadily at her, much surprised. He was a staid and serious man, a little autocratic in his inner build, and but for the Christ in him was inclined to be imperious; reserved, too, but keen of speech under pressure; but still and ever a man worth loving, worth trusting, worth following, ay, worth fearing; for he was a man!

Philip looked, and as he looked, he felt a little rising of the "old man" within him, felt ready to protest a little hotly; the words were on his lips, words which would have smitten sore, but he looked, and saw the quivering lips, the arching brows, the widely-open eyes, the outlook of a yearning soul within, the nervous action of the fingers. He looked and saw, and heard, and felt a call from God! His chin dropped upon his breast; his hands folded themselves together on his knees, he was lost for one moment to all surroundings; in that moment, so long, so short, the past, the present and the future lay before him like a book, and on every page he read, "My debt; my fault; my duty; my Redeemer!" and in his heart he said, "Here am I; send me!"

When he lifted up his eyes again, he saw Brave Barbara looking down on him as he sat, with a smile upon her lips, an exultant light in her eyes, a glow of grace upon her face as if an angel shone. Seizing both his hands, she said, "I know! I know! My Pastor; my dear Pastor! The name of the Lord be praised!"

"I cannot preach," he said, "my plough has rusted so long in the furrow that it has lost its point; my sword has lain so long in its scabbard that it has no edge."

"You shall grind them both on the Stone of Israel," said Barbara. "The ploughshare shall prepare a harvest for God and the sword shall be so mighty in our hand that many shall be the slain of the Lord."

"But I have no place to preach in, nor is there any congregation to preach to;" persisted Philip.

"My brother Peter's house will do for a be-[illegible] temple is [illegible] and the grass for a floor. The very birds of heaven shall [illegible]"

"Ay, but the people?" murmured Philip.

"Oh, I'll fetch in the congregation," said Barbara. "And, indeed, we cannot do better [illegible] Schweitzer may [illegible] and carry the [illegible] news that has come to it for many a day!"

Her energy was irresistible, the homely kitchen of Peter Rechel was requisitioned almost on the spot, and the very next day, Barbara had summoned a little band of hearers, to whom Philip Embury, his tongue only partially unloosed, spoke with slow and unfamiliar speech, the Word of Life. Just previous to that little public beginning, a small handful of them held a service, at which they so felt that Christ was in the midst of them that tears of joy and songs of hope glistened in every eye and leaped from every tongue.

At the subsequent meeting, David Schweitzer gave his young heart to God, came forth to avow himself a disciple of Jesus, while his father tried to sing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," and could not for the lump in his throat that stopped the tune. The triumphant song was sung, however, for all that, and Peter Rechel's homely hearth was "Ballygarane over again and something better," as he was not slow to affirm, in the hearing of happy Barbara, who, for reasons, had wonderfully little to say.

But though she had said little, my heroine had done much. All that day, she had gone to and fro, planning, working, preparing for the evening's venture, except, indeed, when she was alone in her chamber, with her black-letter Bible laid open on her bed, talking to her Master, and listening for the answers that came through the pages of her Talisman, and the secret wires of her own heart. Having done duty there, the Book was taken to Peter Rechel's cottage. Being laid on the little table, flanked with two candles, and Wesley's "Hymn Book" for a close companion, "Philip the evangelist," opened it and read the 53d chapter of Isaiah. Then, like his namesake in the chariot of the Ethiopian, "beginning at the same Scripture he preached unto them Jesus!" A name, at that time, not by any means familiar to the busy thousands of New York.

The next day, Peter Schweitzer and his son, having laden their rude wagon with the "necessaries" they had come to fetch, returned to Ballypeter. It is not too much to say that both father and son found that the new grace of life which had come to them, had not only "kindled in their hearts a little heaven," but had "made the rough paths of rugged nature even," for the wild and almost trackless way that lay between Ballypeter and the city was "smoothed with hope and cheered with song." David, especially was most musical; musical from the heart outwards, for the gift which had come to him while kneeling on the lowly floor of Peter Rechel had made and kept him songful all the time. From his earliest childhood the boy had been remarkable for the beauty of his voice, and of a certain childish way of making little rhymes. The undoubted genius which he possessed, and the gift of song in which he delighted, were now held in fee by Jesus Christ; and "Jesus and his love" will be his theme when gathered multitudes of delighted listeners hear his message and hang upon his tongue. The first recruit enlisted by Philip Embury at the first Methodist meeting held on "the other side the sea," was destined to become a valiant soldier of the Cross.

Immediately after the ice had been broken, as Paul Heck put it, by Philip Embury's first sermon, a Methodist class-meeting was established in the same place. Of course, Philip Embury was the chosen leader. The first members of it were Paul and Barbara Heck, though Barbara's name stands first upon the list; then follow the names of John Lawrence, the young Irishman fresh from Ballygarane, who had become "hired man" to Paul, whose business as a carpenter was a rapidly growing quantity. After this, it is pleasant to find the name of "Betty." It does not appear that she had any other name, at least none other is recorded in the list from which my information is obtained. Betty was a full-blooded negress, the servant, probably, he slave, of some better-class citizen of New York.

It was customary for the negroes to be known among each other by the surnames of their owners and employers; and in all likelihood, "Betty" is not so registered, lest her master should be affronted by having his name set forth on the contemptible little catalogue of secretaries, who had no right to come "between the wind and his nobility." Be that as it may, Betty holds high place at the head of the roll of a Christian discipleship, which numbers many millions—at the head of a religious organization, which now covers the American continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Gulf of Mexico to the snowy peaks of the Frozen Sea.

Previous to this newest of new departures, our friends, the Emburys and the Hecks, had left the hospitable roof of the Stuyvesants, and had found homes of their own. Both Philip and Paul were doing well in their individual calling, and both Mary and Barbara rejoiced greatly that it was now in their power to welcome to their own hearthstone their true friend and sister, Lisbeth Stuyvesant, who, because her heart was as their heart, had given them her hand in a firm friendship that was not likely to be broken off. The goodwill, too, of honest Jan, though he was possessed of far greater store of worldly gear, and though he held high civic office, was heartily continued.

True, the two Palatines were "king's men," and with their wives, were wonderfully loyal to their monarch and his government beyond the sea: true, also, that Jan Stuyvesant was a colonial democrat who, like his restive fellow-lieges, grumbled hard at British taxes, and longed to cut the bonds of British rule; true, that political discussion often waxed warm and even hot, between them; but, nevertheless, they greatly esteemed each other, and the intervention of the merry-hearted Mary, the prudent Barbara, and the quiet Lisbeth set things square again, and brought the temperature down to a more equable degree.

The preaching service and the class-meeting were now removed from Peter Rechel's to Philip Embury's more spacious and convenient quarters; but the number, both of members and hearers, grew and grew, until the place was too strait for them. It was needful to place the people round the windows, and to crown the "stoop" or porchway of the house with men, women, and young people, who came to hear, and feel and seek after God, while Philip Embury lifted before them in simple yet forceful fashion, the Gospel of the Cross of Christ.

Even then, however, as in later time, there were those who were inclined to "let well alone;" to listen to the voice of caution, which is often but another name for fear, and oftener still, another name for something much less worthy; and Peter Rechel gave it voice.

"Beware what ye do," he said, "there is much enmity to the truth in this city, and ye may not hope to escape the teeth thereof, if its jealousy be aroused. 'Twere better to let the sleeping dog lie, and bear yourselves quietly, lest it arise and wax fierce against you."

To all such counsels of fear, Barbara Heck had one all-sufficient answer. "The good Lord," said she, "hath kindled a fire in our souls, and it must shine forth. If we shut it up within ourselves so that other folks shall not blink to look thereon, the fire will die out into darkness, being smothered for want of air."

Barbara's warning against retreat, had the desired effect. The embryo church that, like the oak in the acorn, contains millions in its feeble-looking germ voted as one man for expansion. Out from that little room went forth the little band of Christian believers, filled with all the ardor that comes of a living faith in Christ. Red Cross Knights were they intent on a New Crusade.

On the very first Sabbath after this high resolve was taken to prosecute a "forward movement," their courage was put to the test. While Philip Embury was giving out the opening hymn, and Barbara was about to lead the singing, some half-dozen strangers entered. Two of them were commissioned officers in the king's forces; two of them were connected with the city constabulary, and two of them wore the three-cornered head-gear, the powdered wigs, the lapelled coat, extensive vest and knee-breeches favored by the upper class of that day.

One of these latter, who seemed to be the leader of this unexpected and unwelcome invasion, stood a little advance of his companions. Without uncovering, he stared hard at Philip and then at the audience in a supercilious and imperious fashion, which put a heavy strain on that honest Irishman's self-control. The preacher's first impulse was to bid this personage doff his hat; his second was to pause and see what was next intended, his third and best was to continue reading out the hymn. A smile stole over his sedate features as the thought came to him that a bit of pure undiluted Gospel was there ready for the newcomers. With much force and pathos he read out the next verse.

Meanwhile that good soul, Lisbeth Stuyvesant, who had some inkling of their errand and had all her wits about her, whispered to Mike Finnigan who always kept his wits conveniently at hand. Mike slipped out of the crowded room as quickly and almost as noiselessly as an eel, and running with the speed of a hare along the quiet streets, he was soon standing in the presence of Jan Stuyvesant. That worthy man was seated in a capacious wicker chair in the "stoop" or porch overlooking the garden, and smoking the long pipe which was his favorite diversion in his hours of ease.

"Av yo' plase sor, the misthress says, 'Will yo' come to the meetin' at wanst?' There's Captain Lister and Squoire Blake an' other redcoats an' cocked hats an'——"

But Jan Stuyvesant had laid down his pipe, picked up his straw hat and gone before Mike had finished, muttering to himself—

"Squire Blague, eh? His business dere vos meesjief I egsbect! I sall put a spogue in his vheel." Off he went along the roughly paved Upper Street much faster than his custom was; for burly Jan Stuyvesant was generally in favor of making haste slowly.

Meanwhile, Squire Blake, who was none other than the chief officer of customs in the port of New York, and likely enough, therefore, to be over loyal to the cause of King George, had ventured to interrupt the proceedings at the meeting-room by demanding of Philip Embury, as other cavillers demanded of his Master, "by whose authority doest thou these things, and who gave thee this authority?"

"By the authority of the Lord God Almighty, in the form of this book," said Philip, holding up Barbara's old Bible with both hands, "and by letters patent written by the Holy Spirit in our hearts; and that," he continued, with solemn emphasis, "is an authority before which King George himself—God bless him!—is content to bow. In the king's name, as well as in that of the king's King, I demand by what authority you interrupt Christian worship in this unseemly manner?"

Hereupon, Squire Blake, who was considerably taken aback, and having, just then, no more to say, turned to Captain Lister for moral support, and, perhaps, for inspiration. That gentleman, clad in full regimentals, stood erect in all his inches, as the king's representative might well do. He was about to deliver himself, when the preacher deftly turned the tables on him—took all the wind out of his sails, as he afterwards confessed, by appealing to him for protection!"

"In this free country," said Philip, "where the right of free speech has never yet been questioned and in which his Most Gracious Majesty is the bulwark of law and liberty, I demand, for the law-abiding citizens assembled here, the protection of those who wear his colors and defend his lieges."

What is Nervous Prostration?

A condition resulting from the over-expenditure of vital force—living, in work or society, "beyond our means" as far as brain and nerve power is concerned. Its deplorable symptoms are thus graphically described by a recent writer: "Nervous prostration is as much to be dreaded as any disease which does not threaten speedy death. It is most treacherous, producing a condition more painful than pain, a weakness weaker than extreme fatigue, despondency more dejected than the lowest of low spirits, an instability of self-control destructive of confidence, making work, mental and physical, more distasteful to the once energetic nature that never knew weariness than to the constitutionally lazy; while the exterior aspect is one of health and muscular strength for a single effort may not be impaired. Add to this a craving for sympathy without the means of eliciting it because it is 'mere nervous prostration.'"

Is it to be expected that any medicine put into the stomach can restore a person so afflicted? Is it not more reasonable to look for help to natural means and methods?

The records of Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, of Philadelphia, discoverers and only dispensers of Compound Oxygen, abundantly prove that such is the case. During their twenty-three years of wide practice, thousands (literally) have, after trying every other means attainable, found in Compound Oxygen the one thing needful to put them on the right side of the line of health and happiness.

They constantly receive letters similar to this: "DRS. STARKEY & PALEN:—I take pleasure in recommending your C. O. to any one suffering from nervous prostration. I have realized from its use a degree of benefit I had never expected. Overwork and weak lungs had almost brought me to the end of my rope. C. O. used regularly for three weeks cured a cough which physicians' prescriptions had failed for months to cure. In two months time I believe my entire system was reconstructed. I weigh twenty pounds more than I did when I began its use and feel as big as a house. I have always strenuously objected to the use of drugs and have never used them but by the advice of a physician or one in whom I had confidence. I like C. O. especially because it is not a drug.

A REMARKABLE GATHERING.

FROM one of our subscribers, Mr. J. E. McNaughton, Barnumville, Vt., we have received a letter enclosing a list of the very aged people of Manchester, Vt., writes: "It may interest you to see how fast old people go home. On the 6th day of November, 1890, I was 73 years of age, and having canvassed the town, (Manchester, Vt.), I sent through the press an invitation to one hundred and eight persons. Eighty persons gathered at my house and took dinner, and each received a list."

The list inclosed by Mr. McNaughton is certainly a most interesting and instructive one. There is not a name on it of anyone younger than seventy years, and there are many over eighty, and a few over ninety years of age. Of the total number of guests (108), twenty-nine have died since the reunion. There are about 1,900 inhabitants in Manchester, of whom there were one hundred fully seventy years of age on January 1, 1890. At the head of the invitations to this unique gathering, Mr. McNaughton had printed the text from Zechariah, 8:4: "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts; There shall yet old men and old women dwell in streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in his hand for very age." Surely, there has never been a more remarkable gathering of old people anywhere. It is to be hoped that those who have passed away have already entered on the reward of useful Christian lives, and that they who remain will in due time follow after to enjoy the same happiness.

A CHILD PENITENT.

The story of a lost coin and what it cost is told in the autobiography of the famous Rev. S. Kilpin. He says: "When seven years old, I was left in charge of my father's shop. A man passed, crying, 'Little lambs, all white and clean, at one penny each.' In my eagerness to get one of the pretty little wooly toys I lost all self-command, and taking a penny from the drawer, I made the purchase. My mother inquired how I came by the money. I evaded the question with something like a lie. in God's sight it was a lie, as I kept back the truth. The lamb was placed on the chimney-shelf, and was much admired. To me it was a source of constant grief; continually there were sounds in my ears and heart, 'Thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not lie.' Guilt and darkness overcame my mind; and in agony of soul I went to a hay-loft—the place is now perfectly in my recollection—and there pleaded for mercy and pardon, for Jesus' sake. With joy I left the loft, from a believing application of the text, 'Thy sins, which are many, are forgiven.' I went to my mother, told her what I had done, and sought her forgiveness. HE SERVED THE KING.

DR. BAEDEKER, on his return from his long journey through the Russian Empire seeking out the poor, persecuted, fugitive "Stundists," among high mountains and deep ravines, through storms, and snows, and difficulties of many kinds, was full of thankfulness for many remarkable providences which had marked his course. Even the Tartar guides were astonished at the favorable weather, and said, "This is wonderful, we never knew such weather at this time of the year; it is wonderful." "No," said Dr. Baedeker; "it is not wonderful, for we are the servants of the King who makes the weather." Of course, the guides were anxious to know who that King was, and he had opportunity to tell them of the King of Glory.

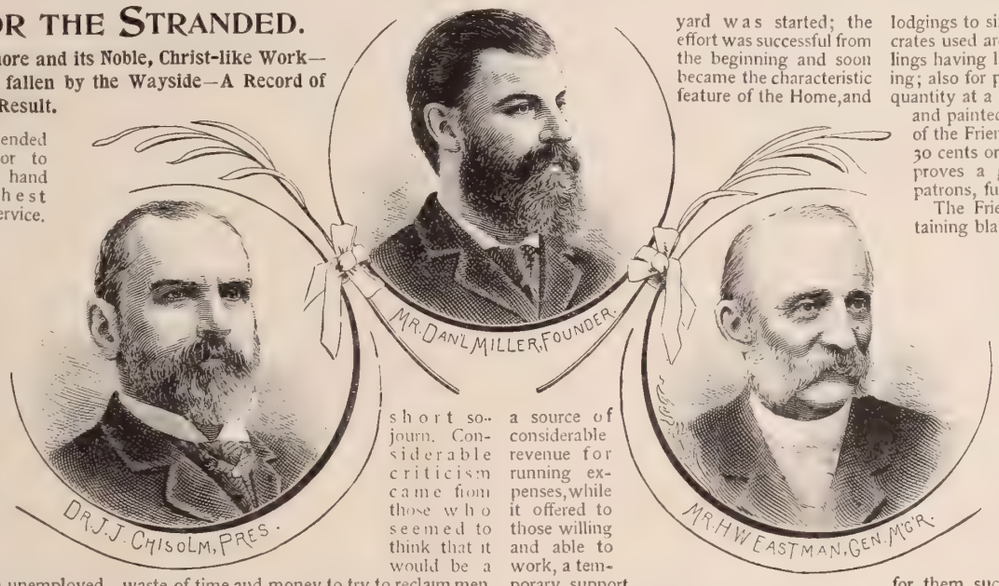
A SHELTER FOR THE STRANDED.

"The Friendly Inn" of Baltimore and its Noble, Christ-like Work—Reclaiming Men who have fallen by the Wayside—A Record of Consecrated Effort and the Result.



EVERY hand that is extended to raise the fallen, or to succor the needy, is a hand engaged in the highest form of Christian service. The present is an age of broad philanthropies and ever widening charities, done in the name of One who thought it not beneath him to become the servant of others, the better to illustrate the nobility of such service when rendered with loving hearts and hands.

One of the best known institutions in Baltimore, Md., is "The Friendly Inn," yet few outside of that city have any conception of the work that is being done in that refuge and home for unfortunate men. It is situated on Sharp St., near Camden St. It was in the latter part of 1884 that the Friendly Inn began its work: there was no Home for the unemployed men in the city at that time and Mr. Daniel Miller, of the firm of Daniel Miller & Co., feeling that there should be a resort of this kind, discussed the subject with a friend and fellow-merchant, Mr. D. W. Glass, stating his willingness to assist such an enterprise if started. Mr. Glass mentioned the name of Mr. H. W. Eastman, who had long been identified with the Y. M. C. A., and other Gospel work. In the private office of Mr. Miller, an arrangement was speedily agreed upon to establish a resort for men in destitute circumstances, and so "The Friendly Inn" was started, Mr. Miller offering to furnish substantial aid, and Mr. Eastman agreeing to accept the permanent management. At first it was a hard struggle and it was looked upon by many as a hazardous experiment. There are numerous charities which profess to be willing to help the respectable and deserving "only" but this Institution proposed to offer to the apparently irreclaimable a temporary shelter, from which, if so disposed, they might seek employment: having in view the prospect of reforming their lives and helping them up to social reinstatement, during their short sojourn. Considerable criticism came from those who seemed to think that it would be a waste of time and money to try to reclaim men in such a low condition, but Christianity teaches the reverse.

The management conceived the plan of opening a wood-yard in connection with the institution, where the unemployed might be furnished with work, and thus be enabled to earn their meals and lodgings. It did not take long to put the idea into practice. The wood-yard was started; the effort was successful from the beginning and soon became the characteristic feature of the Home, and a source of considerable revenue for running expenses, while it offered to those willing and able to work, a temporary support.

Sawing and splitting four sticks secures a good lunch, and ten sticks a regular meal or lodging over-night in a comfortable bed in a heated room. No money is given for the work; the wood is sold at regular city prices and promptly delivered by teams belonging to the institution. Buying a single cord of kindling gives a lunch to forty men, or furnishes lodgings to sixteen homeless ones. The wood crates used are designed for offices and dwellings having limited room for storage of kindling; also for persons preferring to buy a small quantity at a time. The crates are nicely made and painted, and they remain the property of the Friendly Inn. One crate is sold for 30 cents or four for $1. This plan, while it proves a great accommodation to many patrons, furnishes extra work for the men.

The Friendly Inn furnishes books containing blank orders for relief. Those orders are largely used by the various city charitable associations, and also by prominent ministers, lawyers, doctors, merchants, etc. Small envelopes are also furnished with the books, as each order for help is required to be given in a sealed envelope. The order must give the name of the person helped. The amount is charged to the donor, and the bills are collected monthly, the checks being presented as vouchers with the bill. By this plan many cripples, and men physically incapacitated for hard work, are temporarily relieved, and an opportunity is afforded to procure for them such light work as may be found adapted to their circumstances. The Inn desires that its patrons shall assist, in this way only those unable to work in the wood-yard.

The Inn originally occupied one three-story dwelling house, but it soon became apparent that more room was needed, and the adjoining dwelling was purchased. As the work progressed, the two were found to be inadequate, and a third building, also adjoining, was bought. This gave a frontage of 78 feet on one of Baltimore's principal streets, with a depth of 95 feet. The plan of helping men to help themselves soon met with the hearty approval of the charitably disposed, and the money needed for expenses and extensive enlargement and improvement was contributed, and the work of renovation commenced, the management purchasing the property and mortgaging it. A large two-story brick building, 78 feet in length and 50 feet wide, was built on the rear lot. The first story is used for the storage of "long wood" and for stabling wagons, carts, etc. The second is the wood-splitting room, connected by elevator with the floor below. The wood is sent up to the men as they

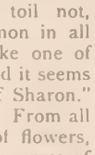
THE SLEEPERS WAKENED.

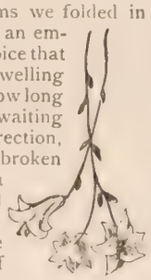
Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, 1 Cor. 15: 20, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept."

ON this glorious Easter morning, amid the music and the flowers, I give you Christian salutation. This morning, Russian meeting Russian on the streets of St. Petersburg hails him with the salutation, "Christ is risen!" and is answered by his friend in salutation, "He is risen indeed!" In some parts of England and Ireland, to this very day, there is the superstition that on Easter morning the sun dances in the heavens; and well may we forgive such a superstition which illustrates the fact that the natural world seems to sympathize with the spiritual.

Hail! Easter morning. Flowers! Flowers! All of them a-voice, all of them a-tongue, all of them full of speech to-day. I bend over one of the lilies and I hear it say: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." I bend over a rose, and it seems to whisper: "I am the Rose of Sharon." And then I stand and listen. From all sides there comes the chorus of flowers, saying: "If God so clothed the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Flowers! Flowers! Braid them into the bride's hair. Flowers! Flowers! Strew them over the graves of the dead, sweet prophecy of the resurrection. Flowers! Flowers! Twist them into a garland for my Lord Jesus on Easter morning. "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be."



Oh, how bright and how beautiful the flowers, and how much they make me think of Christ and his religion, that brightens our life, brightens our character, brightens society, brightens the Church, brightens everything! You who go with gloomy countenance [illegible] better than I am because of your lugubriousness, you cannot cheat me. Pretty case you are for a man that professes to be more than a conqueror. It is not religion that makes you gloomy, it is the lack of it. There is just as much religion in a wedding as in a burial, just as much religion in a smile as in a tear. Those gloomy Christians we sometimes see are the people to whom I like to lend money, for I never see them again! The women came to the Saviour's tomb and they dropped spices all around the tomb, and those spices were the seed that began to grow, and from them came all the flowers of this Easter morn. The two angels robed in white took hold of the stone at the Saviour's tomb and they hurled it with such force down the hill that it crushed in the door of the world's sepulchre, and the stark and the dead must come forth. I care not how labyrinthine the mausoleum or how costly the sarcophagus or however beautifully parterred the family grounds, we want them all broken up by the Lord of the resurrection. They must come out. Father and mother—they must come out. Husband and wife—they must come out. Brother and sister—they must come out. Our darling children—they must come out. The eyes that we close with such trembling fingers must open again in the radiance of that morn. The arms we folded in dust must join ours in an embrace of reunion. The voice that was hushed in our dwelling must be retuned. Oh, how long some of you seem to be waiting—waiting for the resurrection, waiting! And for these broken hearts to-day I make a soft, cool bandage out of Easter flowers.



My friends, I find in the risen Christ a prophecy of our own resurrection, my text setting forth the idea that as Christ has risen, so his people will rise. He the first sheaf of the resurrection harvest. He "the first-fruits of them that slept." Before I get through this morning I will walk through all the cemeteries of the dead, through all the country graveyards, where your loved ones are buried, and I will pluck off these flowers, and I will drop a sweet promise of the Gospel—a rose of hope, a lily of joy on every tomb—the child's tomb, the husband's tomb, the wife's tomb, the father's grave, the mother's grave; and, while we celebrate the resurrecion of Christ, we will at the same time celebrate the resurrection of all the good. "Christ the first-fruits of them that slept." If I should come to you this morning and ask you for the names of the great conquerors of the world, you would say, Alexander, Cæsar, Philip, Napoleon I. Ah! my friends, you have forgotten to mention the name of a greater conqueror than all these—a cruel, a ghastly conqueror. He rode on a black horse across Waterloo and Atlanta and Chalons, the bloody hoofs crushing the hearts of nations. It is the conqueror Death.

He carries a black flag, and he takes no prisoners. He digs a trench across the hemispheres and fills it with the carcasses of nations. Fifty times would the world have been depopulated had not God kept making new generations. Fifty times the world would have swung lifeless through the air—no man on the mountain, no man on the sea, an abandoned ship ploughing through immensity. Again and again has he done this work with all generations. He is a monarch as well as a conqueror; his palace a sepulchre; his fountains the falling tears of a world. Blessed be God, in the light of this Easter morning I see the prophecy that his sceptre shall be broken, and his palace shall be demolished. The hour is coming when all who are in their graves shall come forth. Christ risen, we shall rise. Jesus "the first-fruits of them that slept." Now, around this doctrine of the resurrection, there are a great many mysteries.

You come to me this morning, and say: If the bodies of the dead are to be raised, how is this, and how is that? and you ask me a thousand questions I am incompetent to answer; but there are a great many things you believe that you are not able to explain. You would be a very foolish man to say: "I won't believe anything I can't understand."

Why, putting down one kind of flower-seed, comes there up this flower of this color? Why, putting down another flower-seed, comes there up a flower of this color? One flower white, another flower yellow, another flower crimson. Why the difference when the seeds look to be very much alike—are very much alike? Explain these things. Explain that wart on the finger. Explain why the oak-leaf is different from the leaf of the hickory. Tell me how the Lord Almighty can turn the chariot of his omnipotence on a rose-leaf. You ask me questions about the resurrection I cannot answer. I will ask you a thousand questions about every-day life you cannot answer.

I find my strength in this passage: "All who are in their graves shall come forth." I do not pretend to make the explanation. You can go on and say: "Suppose a returned missionary dies in Brooklyn; when he was in China his foot was amputated; he lived years after in England, and there he had an arm amputated; he is buried to-day in Greenwood; in the resurrection will the foot come from China, will the arm come from England, and will the different parts of the body be reconstructed in the resurrection? How is that possible?"

You say that "the human body changes every seven years, and by seventy years of age a man has had ten bodies; in the resurrection which will come up?" You say, "A man will die and his body crumble into the dust, and that dust be taken up into the life of the vegetable; an animal may eat the vegetable, men eat the animal; in the resurrection, that body distributed in so many directions, how shall it be gathered up?" Have you any more questions of this style to ask? Come on, and ask them. I do not pretend to answer them. I fall back upon the announcement of God's Word: "All who are in their graves shall come forth."

You have noticed, I suppose, in reading the story of the resurrection, that almost every account of the Bible gives the idea that the characteristic of that day will be a great sound. I do not know that it will be very loud, but I know it will be very penetrating. In the mausoleum where silence has reigned a thousand years that voice must penetrate. In the coral cave of the deep that voice must penetrate. Millions of spirits will come through the gates of eternity, and they will come to the tombs of the earth, and they will cry: "Give us back our bodies; we gave them to you in corruption, surrender them now in incorruption. Hundreds of spirits hovering about the crags of Gettysburg, for there the bodies are buried. A hundred thousand spirits coming to Greenwood, for there the bodies are buried, waiting for the reunion of body and soul.

All along the sea route from New York to Liverpool, at every few miles where a steamer went down, departed spirits coming back, hovering over the wave. There is where the City of Boston perished. Found at last. There is where the President perished. Steamer found at last. There is where the Central America went down. Spirits hovering—hundreds of spirits hovering, waiting for the reunion of body and soul. Out on the prairie a spirit alights. There is where a traveler died in the snow. Crash! goes Westminster Abbey, and the poets and orators come forth; wonderful mingling of good and bad. Crash! go the Pyramids of Egypt, and the monarchs come forth.

Who can sketch the scene? I suppose that one moment before that general rising there will be an entire silence, save as you hear the grinding of a wheel, or a clatter of the hoofs of a procession passing into the cemetery. Silence in all the caves of the earth. Silence on the side of the mountain. Silence down in the valleys and far out into the sea. Silence. But in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, as the archangel's trumpet comes pealing, rolling, crashing across mountain and ocean, the earth will give one terrific shudder, and the graves of the dead will heave like the waves of the sea, and Ostend and Sebastopol and Chalons will stalk forth in the lurid air, and the drowned will come up and wring out their wet locks above the billow; and all the land and all the sea become one moving mass of life—all faces, all ages, all conditions gazing in one direction and upon one throne—the throne of resurrection. "All who are in their graves shall come forth."

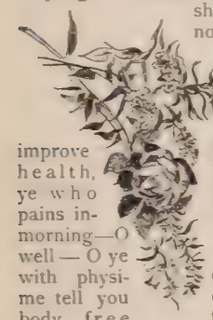
"But," you say, "if this doctrine of the resurrection is true, as prefigured by this Easter morning, Christ 'the first-fruits of them that slept,' Christ rising a promise and a prophecy of the rising of all his people, can you tell us something about the resurrected body?" I can. There are mysteries about that, but I shall tell you three or four things in regard to the resurrected body that are beyond guessing and beyond mistake.

In the first place, I remark in regard to your resurrected body: it will be a glorious body. The body we have now is a mere skeleton of what it would have been if sin had not marred and defaced it. Take the most exquisite statue that was ever made by an artist, and chip it here and chip it there with a chisel, and batter and bruise it here and there, and then stand it out in the storms of a hundred years, and the beauty would be gone. Well, the human body has been chipped and battered and bruised and damaged with the storms of thousands of years—the physical defects of other generations coming down from generation to generation, we inheriting the infelicities of past generations; but in the morning of the resurrection the body will be adorned and beautified according to the original model. And there is no such difference between a gymnast and an emaciated wretch in a lazaretto, as there will be a difference between our bodies as they are now and our resurrected forms.

There you will see the perfect eye, after the waters of death have washed out the stains of tears and study. There you will see the perfect hand, after the knots of toil have been untied from the knuckles. There you will see the form erect and elastic, after the burdens have gone off the shoulder—the very life of God in the body.

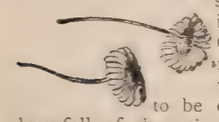
In this world, the most impressive thing, the most expressive thing, is the human face; but that face is veiled with the griefs of a thousand years; but in the resurrection morn that veil will be taken away from the face, and the noon-day sun is dull and dim and stupid compared with the outflaming glories of the countenances of the saved. When those faces of the righteous, those resurrected faces, turn toward the gate, or look up toward the throne, it will be like the dawning of a new morning on the bosom of everlasting day! O glorious, resurrected body!

But I remark also in regard to that body, which you are to get in the resurrection, it will be an immortal body. These bodies are wasting away. Somebody has said as soon as we begin to live we begin to die. Unless we keep putting the fuel into the furnace the furnace dies out. The blood-vessels are canals taking the breadstuffs to all parts of the system. We must be reconstructed hour by hour, day by day. Sickness and death are all the time trying to get their prey under the tenement, or to push us off the embankment of the grave; but, blessed be God, in the resurrection we will get a body immortal. No malaria in the air, no cough, no neuralgic twinge, no rheumatic pang, no fluttering of the heart, no shortness of breath, no ambulance, no dispensary, no hospital, no invalid's chair, no spectacles to improve health, ye who pains in- morning—O well—O ye with physi- me tell you body, free from all disease. Immortal! Immortal!



I will go further, and say in regard to that body which you are to get in the resurrection, it will be a powerful body. We walk now eight or ten miles, and we are fatigued; we lift a few hundred pounds, and we are exhausted; unarmed, we meet a wild beast, and we must run, or fly, or climb, or dodge because we are incompetent to meet it; we toil eight or ten hours vigorously, and then we are weary; but in the resurrection we are to have a body that never gets tired. Is it not a glorious thought?

Plenty of occupation in heaven. I suppose Broadway, New York, in the busiest season of the year, at noonday, is not so busy as heaven is all the time. Grand projects of mercy for other worlds. Victories to be celebrated. The downfall of despotisms on earth to be announced. Great songs to be learned and sung. Great expeditions on which God shall send forth his children. Plenty to do, but no fatigue. If you are seated under the trees of life, it will not be to rest, but to talk over with some old comrade old times—the battles where you fought shoulder to shoulder.



Sometimes in this world we feel we would like to have such a body as that. There is so much work to be done for Christ, there are so many tears to be wiped away, there are so many burdens to lift, there is so much to be achieved for Christ, we sometimes wish that from the first of January to the last of December we could toil on without stopping to sleep, or take any recreation, or to rest, or even to take food—that we could toil right on without stopping a moment in our work of commending Christ and heaven to all the people. But we all get tired.

It is characteristic of the human body in this condition; we must get tired. Is it not a glorious thought that after awhile, we are going to have a body that will never get weary? O glorious resurrection day! Gladly will I fling aside this poor body of sin and fling it into the tomb, if at thy bidding I shall have a body that never wearies. That was a splendid resurrection hymn that was sung at my father's burial:

So Jesus slept, God's dying Son
Passed through the grave and blessed the bed.
Rest here, blest saint, till from his throne
The morning breaks to pierce the shade.

O blessed resurrection! Speak out, sweet flowers, beautiful flowers, while I tell you of a risen Christ and tell of the righteous who shall rise. May God fill you this morning with anticipation!

I heard of a father and son who, among others were shipwrecked at sea. The father and the son climbed into the rigging. The father held on, but the son after awhile lost his hold in the rigging and was dashed down. The father supposed he had gone hopelessly under the wave. The next day the father was brought ashore from the rigging in an exhausted state, and laid in a bed in a a fisherman's hut, and after many hours had passed he came to consciousness, and saw lying beside him on the same bed, his boy. Oh my friends! what a glorious thing it will be when we wake up at last to find our loved ones beside us! Coming up from the same plot in the graveyard, coming up in the same morning light—the father and son alive forever, all the loved ones alive forever, nevermore to weep, nevermore to part, nevermore to die.

May the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant make you perfect in every good work, to do his will and let this brilliant scene of the morning transport our thoughts to the grander assemblage before the throne. This august assemblage is nothing compared with it. The one hundred and forty and four thousand, and the "great multitude that no man can number," some, of our best friends among them, we after awhile to join the multitude. Blessed anticipation!

My soul anticipates the day,
Would stretch her wings and soar away,
To aid the song, the palm to bear,
And bow, the chief of sinners, there.

A LETTER FROM PERSIA.

Most of our readers have heard of Deacon Abraham and his good work in and around Oroomiah, Persia. The following is a letter recently received from him by an English friend: Praise the Lord we have been delivered from the plague of cholera, and preserved in the midst of the many trials that oppress and destroy our country. Christians are greatly harassed here. We are weary of pleading our cause to the Government. We appeal to the Lord, who saves wonderfully; but we are weak and often forget our refuge and salvation.

Our poor fellow-Christians under Turkish rule, in the mountains of Kurdistan, are also oppressed. For some years past their land has brought forth little produce—corn, etc.—and there is scarcity. More than in any previous year we have sheltered the poor and needy. Sometimes our stables and mangers are full of them, so that our hungry cattle have to give place to the wretched creatures, hungry and almost naked.

As my door is open to them, they come to our morning prayer-meetings. Then I generally give them each a loaf of bread and a handful of raisins; but this we are not able to do always. Our circle of orphans, workers, etc., is more than sixty in all. We ourselves are often in need, but the Lord has been very gracious to us, and we believe he will continue to be so.

A SHELTER FOR THE STRANDED.

apply for work; large bins are provided for the "kindling," also for "pine blocks" of various sizes, for the fire-place, etc. Here also the crates are filled and stored ready for delivery.

With the money contributed, the Inn was also enabled to build a large three-story brick building, the first floor being used for kitchen and dining-room purposes, the second a "cleansing department," and containing the latest improved hot and cold "showers." The largest dormitory contains fifty-six beds. This room is 78 feet by 40 feet, well ventilated and comfortably heated by steam. It is a model room in every particular. The second dormitory is smaller, having a capacity of twenty beds, heated and ventilated as is the larger room. Besides these, there are twenty-four other bedrooms of various sizes and some single rooms, the total sleeping capacity at present being 125 beds.

THE LATE MR. JOHN D. WATTLES.

Among the recent improvements is a beautiful chapel and entertainment room. Since the beginning of the work of the Friendly Inn the managers have felt that the permanent reclamation of the men was of far greater importance than the temporary shelter and food earned by the sawing of wood. The Inn has always had a small room, in which Gospel meetings were held, but it was found far too small. The new room seats 150 persons and is well lighted, ventilated and heated. In the room, Gospel meetings are held on the Sabbath and on certain nights during the week, the city churches volunteering help, in the way of speakers, organist, singers, etc.

Among the unfortunates are found many men of fine education and business qualifications, who have drifted with the ebb tide, too careless to pull for the shore of prosperity. Some who find a temporary home at the Inn, once held positions of influence and affluence. They are mostly the victims of strong drink. The manager reports that many who come to him literally in rags and filth, have gone away from the Inn reclaimed, and have been restored to the friends and society. Some are now in the Gospel ministry, or in Y. M. C. A. work. Others are merchants, doing a prosperous business. The Inn aims to offer to the unemployed a transient home until they can secure permanent employment, and while seeking this opportunity, to reclaim and fit them for a higher and more useful life.

Practical Work.

In eight years the Friendly Inn has furnished 276,960 meals., of which 250,376 were either paid for or worked out. The number of lodgings for the same period were 118,021, of which 104,150 were worked out or paid for. As a means of lessening the tendency to pauperism, the report of the manager shows that at the beginning of the work, 30 per cent. of the meals and lodgings were given away, while it is now less than 5 per cent. Although the Inn is exclusively for men, yet a considerable outside charity work, in the way of relieving poor families, is done through the order check-books, which contain blank orders for soup, coffee and bread.

The Friendly Inn is an incorporated institution under the supervision of a Board of twenty-four Directors, of which Mr. Daniel Miller has been president for the past eight years. He declined a re-election at the last annual meeting, and Dr. J. J. Chisolm was elected president, with Mr. Daniel Miller treasurer, succeeding Mr. I. K. Miller, who had held that office for the previous eight years. Mr. H. W. Eastman was continued as Manager. The Inn is at this time burdened with a debt of some $15,000, and it is the purpose of the management to make a vigorous effort to pay it off. The present president, Dr. J. J. Chisolm, M.D., LL.D., is the organizer and executive head of the celebrated hospital known as the Presbyterian Eye, Ear and Throat Charity Hospital, and is one of the most widely known practical oculists and as a manager and organizer of intelligent, charitable work, he has hardly a superior. So much good has been accomplished in the past, and the work has been so generously acknowledged and blessed, that the directors have every confidence that its wants will be as abundantly supplied in the future.

A LIGHT-BEARER FALLEN.

The Career of the Late Mr. John D. Wattles, the Well-known Philadelphia Publisher.

In the death of Mr. John D. Wattles of Philadelphia, which occurred on March 21, the religious public has sustained a severe loss. The services it was his honor and privilege to render to the cause of Christ in our land were of a value it is impossible to overestimate; and they will bear richer fruit yet, as the years roll by. As civilization advances, life becomes more complex, and opportunities of usefulness multiply, beyond the conception of previous generations. One of these opportunities Mr. Wattles perceived and grasped, using it so wisely and energetically that tens of thousands of his fellow Christians became his debtors. The opportunity came with the adoption of the International system of Sunday School Lessons. The fact that the attention of millions of children in the Sunday Schools of our own and other lands would, on a given day, be concentrated on the same passage of Scripture, was very suggestive. Many of these children would be grouped around teachers who were intensely desirous of doing them all possible good by bringing out of the subject the lessons it was capable of teaching, but who were ill-prepared to give effect to their desire. Many of them were engaged in business during the week and few had access to the theological libraries in which are stored the results of centuries of Biblical study. If the best light could be gathered and concentrated on the subject for the day, and its vehicle be placed within the reach of all, how great a boon that would be for teacher and pupil! It was this task that Mr. Wattles set himself. He was already associated with Dr. Trumbull, the graceful and luminous writer, and the ablest American authority on Sunday School work. From every field, historical, exegetical, anecdotal and practical, material available for use in the school was collected by Dr. Trumbull and his aids and so arranged as to be an exhaustive commentary on the Sunday School lesson of the week. This commentary in miniature Mr. Wattles embodied in a journal, which, by skilful management, he produced at a price so low that every teacher could possess it. With the genius of the born publisher, rarer even than the literary gift, he made the existence of the publication known in the Sunday Schools throughout the land and called the attention of the teachers to the advantages to be derived from its perusal. Thus the Sunday School Times began its more extended and beneficent work, equipping the teacher for his duty and enabling him to give to his pupils an intelligent and practically useful knowledge of his theme. Those alone who realize the importance of having the next generation thoroughly rooted and grounded in Scriptural knowledge, can estimate such a service.

Mr. Wattles was comparatively a young man when he died. He formed the connection that was to lead to his life work in 1870, when he was little more than twenty years old. He was living at that time at Norwich, Conn., and was a teacher in a Sunday School there, when he first met Dr. Trumbull, who at that time had charge of the affairs of the Sunday School Union in New England. He became Dr. Trumbull's assistant, and, subsequently, his son-in-law. When, in 1865, Dr. Trumbull accepted the invitation of Mr. Wanamaker to become the editor of the Sunday School Times, Mr. Wattles accompanied him and became business manager of the paper. After two years, they purchased the property and became its sole owners. The circulation of the journal at that time was less than 25,000, but under Mr. Wattles's enterprising management it grew rapidly. How much the tact, sound judgment, energy and sterling integrity of Mr. Wattles had to do with its success, Dr. Trumbull gracefully acknowledges. "I could have done," he says, "little without him; and he deserves the credit of the best that has been secured in every department of the paper." Mr. Wattles was also active in church affairs. He was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, a member of various Boards, the Superintendent of a Sunday School and a manager of the Pennsylvania Bible Society. In all his offices he rendered valuable service and his place will not be easily filled.

JOB'S APPEAL TO GOD.

S. S. Lesson for April 16. Job. 23: 1-10. Golden Text, John 13: 7. By Mrs M. Baxter.

"WHAT I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." How many Christians do not trust God's dealings with them because they do not understand them! And yet how often is it that the dispensations of God which seem to us the most incomprehensible, are the very means in his hand to lead us on to a new and deeper knowledge of himself! Job could understand how to obey God, submit to and to trust him, even when it cost him the loss of all he had upon earth, as long as he maintained his repute for holinesss. But to suffer thus, and to be misunderstood and despised by the very friends who had looked up to him as the perfect man, just when his submission to God had stood the most tremendous strain, to lose his health as well as all else, and then his reputation—he who had been so true to God—it was too much, even his patience gave way.

Job was an old Testament man, he had not yet learned the power of the blood of Christ to justify the ungodly, he knew nothing of denying himself in the sense of letting his cause and his reputation go out of his own hands; he had no conception how to "endure grief suffering wrongfully" (1. Pet. 2: 19), when the wrong came through the hands of man. Job would meet God in his old character as the perfect man with an unbroken spirit and an unstained reputation; his conscience did not condemn him of being untrue; and he was deeply hurt that his past endurance seemed to be unappreciated. All his arguments with his friends, all his appeals to God went to the same end, to obtain a justification of his life and conduct which he thought was due to him. But God would lead this old Testament man on to other lines. Job's desperate clinging to his old reputation as the "upright," "the perfect man" must be conquered, and Job must be broken before he could be blest in a new and higher way.

How little he knew that he was going to be an object lesson for men of many lands and many generations! How thankful he must be now for the honor which God put upon him in thus trying him that he might be made so wide and so lasting an instrument of blessing! How infinitely more important than to set himself right with his three friends and his acquaintances during his short lifetime on other earth, and to have, for that brief season, a self-satisfaction in a conscious superiority to them! Oh how small is any position here on earth, compared to working with God or reigning with Christ!

There had been much which was terribly galling in the insinuations of Job's three friends. Their only idea of helping him was to reproach him, and to suggest that he and his children had sinned in a way which had provoked God to send this judgment upon him. Formerly sitting at his feet to learn, now, in the time of [illegible] to dictate to him as an inferior, with all the vulgar assumption of unrefined and unspiritual minds. Who would not have failed under such circumstances? Only such as have the spirit of Christ.

It is a rare thing when God calls any one of [illegible] that he could count upon him; there was not another man in his generation who was, in the same measure, made to be a battle ground between God and Satan. The more [illegible] one of his children is, the more difficult will be his path, the more intense the fire of the great [illegible]

God Needs Living Witnesses

Job's attempts to meet and disprove the insinuations, and even false accusations of his friends, prove utterly useless. Again and again in answering them, they seem to drop out of his sight, and, like the compass to the pole, he turns back to his God. And wonderful gleams of light break in upon him in the midst of the darkness which almost hides God from him. Once he says in the midst of his earnest cry that he may understand, that he may know his transgression and his sin: "Though thou slay me, yet will I trust in him." (13: 15.) A kind of intuition of God's dealings with him makes him say, "He hath also set me up for his mark" (16: 12), and a consciousness that his cause was God's makes him assert: "Even now behold, my witness is in heaven, and he that voucheth for me is on high" (16: 19 R.V.) and again after a word of deepest grief and almost despair, a vision of the resurrection bursts upon him (19: 23-27.) What a proof that God does not abandon his children in the time of darkest trial: "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me." In every lions' den there is an angel, in every fiery furnace the Lord's presence, for trusting children of God.

But, in spite of these gleams of heaven's light, Job had yet to learn that he must abstain from all defence and retaliation. He said truly that his friends were "forgers of lies," physicians of no value," (13: 4), "miserable comforters," (16: 3), but God could have said it to them far better than Job could. The personal feeling which he showed robbed the very truth of its power to convict them, and brought Job down to their level, and out of communion with God. Every word they spoke came to him as the perpetual dropping of water, the perpetual friction which leads to desperation. Oh how man fails either to comfort or to understand a heart which is being tried, proved, and educated by God! Man is out of place where he interferes with God's education of his child. Job's contact with man brought him so down to man's level that he descends to recrimination, and seems sometimes even to lose sight of God; "Suffer me, and I also will speak; and after that I have spoken, mock on. As for me, is my complaint to men? And why should I not be impatient? Mark me, and be astonished, and lay your hand upon your mouth." (21: 3-5, R.V.) Was this the perfect man? Such asperity, after the vision of the resurrection shows how little Job's spirit was really broken, and how much he still lived in time. The reply of Eliphaz whose conceptions did not in any way take in God's dealings with Job, only made things worse. It was as one having lost for the time his communion with God, and yet unconscious of any wilful sin, that Job says: "Even to-day is my complaint bitter, and my stroke is heavier than my groaning. Oh that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat." But how mistaken is his view of things: "I would order my cause before him and fill my mouth with arguments!" The more closely God dealt with him, the more Job was on the defensive, because he had such an unconquerable belief in his own integrity. His trust in God had been proved great indeed, but his trust in himself exceeded his trust in God. "I could order my cause before him," conduct my own case: Oh how ignorant was Job of the need of a Mediator; how little he really knew his own heart! A mouth full of argument can never prevail with God. "The spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made" (Isa. 57: 16): God seeks the Mary spirit which sits at his feet and hears his word. Job was ready to do, to say, to endure anything which would manifest his own devotion and integrity of purpose, but as yet he could not trust his case out of his own hands even into God's.

He continues his assertions: "I would know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me." (R.V.) Poor Job, it was just here that he failed, he did not know or understand what God was saying and what he was not still enough to hear. "Would he contend with me in the greatness of his power? Nay; but he would give heed unto me. There the upright might reason with him; so should I be delivered for ever from my judge" (R.V.) Poor mistaken man, when he thinks it is his misfortune and not his fault that he cannot find his God. Job came to God in a character which finds

No Admission to His Presence.

"I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." (Matt. 9: 13) "The upright," the consciously innocent; such was Job in his own eyes, and in such a character he would conduct his case, and argue it out with God. He had not yet heard the invitation: "Come now and let us reason together saith the Lord," not about your uprightness; no, but about your sins. "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be white as snow, though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." (Isa. 1: 18.) Only sin can separate man from God, but Job had yet to learn how to measure sin in the balances of the sanctuary, and to let God teach his conscience.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

The Refiner of Gold.

A SERIES of speeches from the friends and replies from Job intervene between this lesson and that of last week. The author while attending to his main business of setting he problem before his readers is artistically true to nature in making his characters defend the positions they have respectively taken. Eliphaz, who represents the man of position and wealth and social eminence, defends his argument by instances from his own wide experience "I have seen," he says, again and again. Bildad, who represents the student and the scholar, fortifies himself with the sayings of former ages. While Zophar as the plain, common-sense business man, bluntly tells Job that God has given him a lighter punishment than he deserves. To all of which Job replies that he has not been the sinner his friends think him; that God knows it and that whatever may be the meaning of these calamities, they are not punishments for sin. He is sure that if he could stand before God and vindicate himself, that there would be an authoritative explanation. The passage in which he declares his conviction is the subject of the lesson. In the Revised Version it reads thus:

Even to-day is my complaint rebellious:
My stroke is heavier than my groaning.
Oh that I knew where I might find him,
That I might come even to his seat!
I would order my cause before him,
And fill my mouth with arguments.
I would know the words which he would answer me,
And understand what he would say unto me.
Will he contend with me in the greatness of his power?
Nay, but he would give heed unto me.
There the upright might reason with him;
So should I be delivered for ever from my judge.
Behold, I go forward, but he is not there;
And backward, but I cannot perceive him:
On the left hand, when he doth work, but I cannot behold him:
He hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him.
But he knoweth the way that I take:
When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.

Oh, that I knew where I might find him! It is the man who is in earnest that obtains what he wants. "I must see him," said an applicant at the office of a public person. "You cannot see him," said the servant, but the man waited at the door. A friend went out to him and said, "You cannot see the chief, but I can give you an answer." "No," said the unfortunate pleader, "I will stay all night on the doorstep, but I will see the man himself. He alone will serve my turn." You do not wonder that, after many rebuffs, he ultimately gained his point. It would be an infintely greater wonder if an importunate sinner did not obtain an audience from the Lord Jesus.

He would give heed unto me. The second Duke of Gordon who was a Roman Catholic rented one of his farms to a Protestant. The man paid his rent punctually for many years, but one year misfortunes came upon him and the rent fell in arrear. The Duke's steward after waiting some time seized the farmer's effects and advertised them for sale. The farmer was sure that if he could only see the Duke himself that time would be granted him, but the Duke was traveling on the Continent and the farmer had no means of finding him. Happily, however, he returned before the goods were sold. Then the farmer eagerly sought an interview. "What is the matter Donald?" the Duke asked. Donald told the story and it touched the Duke's heart. Not only was time granted but the debt was remitted. Donald was going away joyfully when his attention was attracted by some old pictures hanging in the place of honor in the Duke's library. The Duke noticed the farmer looking curiously at the pictures and said, "They are my patron saints." Donald was puzzled and asked what that meant. "I pray to them to intercede with God for me." Donald looked at him in pity, "Ah your Grace," he said, "you'd better do as I have done—go to the fountain head. I went to Sawney Gordon and it did no good. I'd have been sold up if I had not gone to the Duke himself. If your Grace will go to God himself he will forgive your sins as freely as you have forgiven my debt."

I cannot see him. We have sometimes to trust God in the dark as Job did, and we have to hold fast our belief that he is wise and good and loving even when he is taking from us what we love and treasure most. But those who thus trust him without knowing the reasons for what he does are safe. A gentleman once wished to examine a deep coal mine. Coming through the mouth of the shaft, he noticed a rope by which he supposed the miners descended. Taking hold slowly he let himself down. When at last he came to the end of the rope, he found to his horror that he had not reached the bottom of the mine; he realized that he had made a fatal mistake. He could not reascend, and to let go his hold was to fall, perhaps hundreds of feet, to the rocks below. All around was darkness. He called wildly for help, but there came no response. At last, giving up to his fate, he let go the rope and fell. He dropped about six inches, and stood safe and sound upon the rock bottom of the mine.

He knoweth the way that I take. We may not know, and the experience may be alarming, but if we are sure that God is guiding us we shall not be terrified. Dr. Guthrie says: "Were you ever at sea in a storm, when the ship reeled to and fro like a drunken man, and struggling as for life in the arms of death, now rose to the top of the billow, and now plunged into the trough of the sea? Partially infected with others' terror, did you ever leave shrieking women and pale men below to seek the deck and look your danger squarely in the face? In such circumstances I know nothing so reassuring as the calm confidence that sits on the brow of the weather-beaten man who, with iron strength, leans upon the wheel and steers our ship through the roaring billows. Such, only much higher, is the confidence we draw from the wisdom of God."

The conviction that nothing happens to us without God's knowledge and consent is a great comfort. Darwin describes a marine plant which rises from a depth of one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet, and floats on the surface of the water in the midst of the great breakers of the Western Ocean. The stem of this plant is less than an inch through; yet it grows and thrives and holds its own against the fierce smitings and pressures of breakers which no masses of rock, however hard, can long withstand. What is the secret of this marvellous resistance and endurance? How can this little slender plant face the fury of the elements so successfully? It reaches down into the still depths, where it fixes its grasp, to the naked rocks; and no commotion of the upper waters can shake it loose.

I shall come forth as gold. Gold is not pure until it has been through the fire. The ordeal is necessary to remove the dross from it. The assayer then puts his mark upon it showing how near it is to absolute purity. God's children bear the marks of losses and trials and sorrows which show how much discipline they have borne in being purified and fitted for God's service. "I remember," says Dr. Mac Larem, "a story of Mr. Mack, the famous Baptist minister. He had not seen his mother for many years, but when he was preaching in Glasgow he went to visit her. He knew her at once, but he had changed so much that she did not recognize him. It so happenened that when he was a child his mother had accidentally wounded his wrist with a knife. To comfort him she said, "Never mind, my bonnie bairn, your mither will ken you by that when you are a man." When Mack's mother would not believe that the grave fine-looking visitor could be her own child, he turned up his sleeve and cried, 'Mither, mither, dinna ye ken that?' In a moment they were in each other's arms. Ah, brethren! the Lord knows the spot of his children. He acknowledges them by the mark of correction. He knows the wounds he made when exercising his sacred surgery."

KING UMZILA'S REPROOF.

Missionary Richards Relates a Striking Incident of his African Experience — "Why Did you not Give us the Good Book before?"—Establishing a Chain of Missions in Zambesia.

YOUNG as far as modern knowledge and civilization are concerned, and still in their childhood, in a spiritual sense, the races of Africa yet belong to a land which once possessed a culture and civilization equal in many respects to any in the world. Mashonaland, supposed to be the ancient Ophir of the Bible, is a country whose heathen population knows nothing of its history of the remarkable ruins of temples, towers and fortifications with which their territory abounds and which point to a power and magnificence long since passed away. Thus far the natives are strangers to the Gospel, for with the exception of a few outlying mission stations, no attempt has yet been made to send the message of grace to the Mashonas. It is to these people, rude, ignorant and heathen as they are, yet possessing some of the finest traits of the African races that Bishop William Taylor is now arranging to send missionaries and to establish mission stations at different points in Zambesia and particularly in Mashonaland. Rev. E. H. Richards and Mrs. Richards will shortly start from this country as the pioneers of the new movement. Mr. Richards has already spent ten years in Eastern Africa in missionary work, and is therefore familiar with at least the outlying portions of the new field. He is acquainted with a number of the African languages and his knowledge will be of great practical value in his future work, as he pushes on to the interior, to points where no white man has yet stood as witness for Christ. Both he and Mrs. Richards are earnest, energetic, devoted workers, and it is hoped that their efforts may be divinely blessed in bringing about the foundation of a chain of mission stations which shall girdle Mashonaland, and be the means of bringing in many thousands of its people to the Gospel fold.

Mr. Richards tells some unusually interesting episodes in his experience as a missionary in Africa:

"Few Americans," he says, "have any idea of the extent of the Zambesi Valley. It is fully half as large as the Mississippi Valley. The Zambesi river is 2500 miles long, its most important feature being Zambesi Falls, where a tremendous volume of water drops from a height of 360 feet with a sheer plunge that dwarfs other falls into insignificance. The Victoria Falls are the finest in the world. Flat-boats could probably sail the entire length of the Zambesi. It will be our aim to navigate it as far up as possible.

"The kings of the different tribes along the Zambesi Valley have always accorded a friendly welcome to missionaries. Livingstone went through Zambesi, from one side to the other. Dr. Colliard, the French missionary, is already at Victoria Falls. Mashonaland, the new field which we are about to open up to the Gospel, is bounded on the north by the Zambesi and on the south by the Limpopo rivers. Gazaland lies on the east while on the west is Matabeleland. The capital of the country in Salisbury, 400 miles inland from Port Beira, on the Indian ocean. It is our purpose to enter the Zambesi district, and secure the most favorable sites for missionary operations. Missions in Mashonaland will be under the protection of the British flag.

"I am Superintendent of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church," continued Mr. Richards, "and I have offered to go there in the name of the Church, under Bishop Taylor. As to the people among whom we propose to work, I may say this: The people of those sections on the lower side of the Zambesi river to the east are the Gaza people among whom I have have experience. They have been subdued by the Zulus fifty or sixty years ago. Mashonaland lies west of Gazaland, and its people are supposed to use the Zulu language. In Matabeleland also the Zulu tongue is spoken.

"In 1881, we had the pleasure of being the first missionaries to enter Gazaland. Approaching the royal court at a place called Umoyamuhla (which means 'Haven of Fair Winds'), we learned that Umzila ('Cows' Tails) was king. When we were still six miles from the royal kraal, a native—a person of some importance, apparently—halted us and stepping up to our hammock, asked in fair English:

"'Can you read?'

"To a man who had not spoken English for six months, this was surprising.

"'Certainly I can,' was the answer. 'I want to hear you,' he continued. I took out a Zulu testament and read, translating as I proceeded:

Ku hugula tuni,	In the beginning,
Nungungulu,	the Great-Great,
A di Gira,	He did create.
Juu ja ji,	the heavens,
Ni Mifu,	and earth, etc.

"Hearing me read, the man looked earnestly and said: 'He is one of them; yes, I am sure he is one of them. Can you sing?' 'Yes.' 'I want to hear you.' I always sing for anybody who will listen, so I sang a hymn. 'Yes, indeed,' he muttered again. 'I knew. He is one of them. Have you a gun?' 'Yes.' 'Have you any ivory?' 'No sir.' 'A gun, no ivory; well then are you umfundisi (missionary?') (In their tongue, funda means to learn, fundisa, to cause to learn, and the noun is umfundisi, which is applied to all missionaries as teachers, and means one who causes to learn.) I answered him in the affirmative. 'If you are a missionary, you will have an interview with the king; if you are a traveler, you will be done up in your hammock and returned to the coast.' 'Who are you?' I asked. 'I am Nhlanhlaka (Two-jaws-of-the-face.) Four years ago,' he said, 'I went eight hundred miles below to Natal. I was in one of their churches and saw the Zulu children reading and singing and receiving presents from the Christmas tree. I saw the people and the cattle and oxen and property in Natal, and they all told me it was the book that made the difference. Umzila the king, is very anxious to see the book.'

"We passed on the royal kraal and Umzila sent a messenger to invite us in. On the outside of the village we struck our tent in a spot beautiful for situation. The king, we learned, had about one thousand wives. He was said to have twenty regiments of soldiers and at the time of our visit, there were probably 50,000 to 75,000 persons in that place. It was the largest native village I had ever visited. When the heat of the day had passed—perhaps about 4 P. M.—the king came out of his kraal and seated himself on the ground. I spread a blanket for him, but he declined to use it, saying: 'the ground is accustomed to me; you sit on the blanket; you are not well.' I did so, and we began conversation. He was eager to see the book which he had heard the white man had. I insisted on presenting my gifts, but he immediately gave them away. A cornet horn pleased him much, but he gave it back, saying: 'I have no ivory to pay for it.' I had a spare suit of clothes which I presented—a coat to one and trousers to another, and it was amusing to see how these garments were utilized, the arms answering for the legs, and vice-versa, and the buttons being fastened around the neck with the utmost confidence that this arrangement was quite proper.

"Now it happened that I had two Testaments in the Zulu language," continued Mr. Richards, "but one had been at the bottom of the Zambesi river. The other was a handsome gilt-edge one, and I wanted—naturally I suppose—to keep it for myself. So I took the wet Testament and gave it to my boy. He said: 'Why don't you give him the best?' I then gave the king my gilt-edged Testament. I supposed that he would carry it as a fetich; but he didn't. When the boy presented the book, he said: 'Father, white man has brought you a book.' Umzila had never seen a book. He rose, walked over to my blanket and took the book in his hand, and turning to me, said:

"'Ya bonga incwadi yako,' ('I thank you for the book.') I immediately rose and said, 'Father, why do you thank me?' 'I thank you,' he answered, 'because now I shall own the white man's things.' 'Why do you think the book will be so valuable to you?' 'Now I shall have cattle, goats, powder and wagons.'

"Such was the opinion this powerful ruler had formed of the white man's Bible!

"I then related to him the substance of the Gospel, showing that the King of kings the 'great great' is not only king of this world but of the other world which we cannot see. Umzila turned around with the book still in his hand and said, 'Is this the same book the white man has?' 'Yes.' 'For the black man, too?' 'Yes.' 'This King of kings, the great-great, sent this book into the world?' 'Yes.' 'Will it make my bad people good?' (The king is not only the ruler but the administrator of the law, and directs the execution of all criminals.) 'Yes.' 'And does it show us the path to that other world of which you speak, and does the sun shine on the path?' 'Yes; it gives light on the path the whole way.' 'Will I be a king over there and not a woman?' (He did not want to be a woman.) 'Yes, we will all be kings over there.' 'My people, will they be with me?' 'Yes, they can all go there.' 'And that sorrow that splits men's souls, will that be done away?' 'Yes, there will be no more sorrow, nor tears nor crying.'

"Then he asked, in the most serious manner, 'If these things are so, why haven't you told us before?'

Friends of the project for establishing the new missions have been actively engaged in raising funds for the equipment and support of the pioneer movement. Generous responses have been received from different parts of the country from those interested, and any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD whose hearts are in the evangelization of the Dark Continent, and who desire to help to lift the standard of the Cross among the Mashonas, can have an opportunity of doing so by addressing Mr. Richards, in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

His Was a Helpful Life.

COL. ELLIOTT FITCH SHEPARD, who died suddenly in New York a few days ago, while undergoing a surgical operation, was a noble type of the Christian gentleman and was one of the most generous contributors in the metropolis to all deserving charities. He was born in Jamestown, N. Y., in 1834, of New England Puritan ancestors, his father being Fitch Shepard, President of the

THE LATE COL. E. F. SHEPARD.

National Bank Note Company. Mr. Shepard adopted the legal profession. At the breaking out of the war he raised a regiment of volunteers known as the Shepard Rifles.

In 1867, he married Miss Margaret Louise Vanderbilt. Five years ago he purchased the New York Mail and Express from Cyrus W. Field and at once attracted attention by his uncompromising advocacy of Sabbath observance, and by the printing of a Bible text daily at the head of the editorial page. Col. Shepard became the Chairman of the Sabbath Observance Committee of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church and the President of the American Sabbath Union, an office he held ever since its organization in 1888. He founded the New York Bar Association.

In 1884 he gave up his law practice and went abroad, and some time later visited Alaska, where he was greatly interested in the social and moral condition of the people. For several years he spent not less that $12,000 annually, building churches for the natives and supplying them with teachers and food. He never wearied of doing good deeds or relieving the needy. Few seekers left him empty-handed; he aided many weak churches, established funds and scholarships in a number of institutions, and gave liberally to the Boards of the Presbyterian Church. St. Paul's Institute, Tarsus, in Asia Minor, was largely founded and supported by Col. Shepard. His life was essentially a helpful one. It has been said, probably with truth, that Col. Shepard gave more largely to church and charitable purposes than any man in the United States in proportion to his fortune. His widow and five children survive him.

SLIPPERY PLACES.

DURING the past winter in this latitude, we had an opportunity of finding out what the old Bible writers meant by slippery places. In those warmer climates they may never have seen a sheet of frozen rain covering the earth, as we on many occasions saw; but they might have had a general idea of it. As one audience on one particular slippery night adjourned, some went flat down, some fell head foremost, some gracefully sat down; but the more part struck out indefinitely, and swung round, and slipped about, and caught after things. We never saw such a spectacle. Neither sliding nor skating seems appropriate on your way from church, but there was nothing else to do. Walking was abolished. Elders, deacons, and clergymen, after singing the doxology, took to field sports. We saw one good man, of undoubted sobriety, getting down into the gutter as though he intended to stay there. A modest woman, without introduction, threw her arms around a lamp-post as though it were a friend from whom she had been parted for fifteen years. A sedate and inoffensive man went round like an unmanageable ship at sea, and ran the boom of his umbrella into a lady's head rigging. Tides of travel from different churches met each other, unable to stop: Presbyterians and Methodists, Baptists and Pedo-baptists, who had been quarreling for some time, suddenly and convulsively embracing each other. It seemed to us incongruous that so many people should have taken their prayer-books along with them when they went a-sliding. As we went creeping along home, holding on iron fences, and balancing ourselves against door-steps, and listening to the thump, and crash, and sprawl, and scrabble, and emphatic exclamations of unfortunate pedestrians on all sides, we fell to moralizing. We thought how easy it is to sit in church and sing "Rock of Ages," and preach about duty and heaven, not realizing there is a cold, slippery world waiting for us outside. The tug, and strain, and self-poising, comes after the doxology. First the benediction, then the ice. That [illegible] sing, and preach splendidly go down as soon as they get out of doors. They imagine it is going to be Antioch, and Mount Pisgah, and Coronation, all the way. The reason that so many good men fall, is because they do not take heed of their steps. David seems to feel his feet going from under him on an uneven cake of ice when he cries out: "My steps had well-nigh slipt."

But alas for those who have nothing to hold on to as they pass on their way! Their feet will slide in due time. The pond of sin is smoothly frozen over, and they venture on it only to fall through; and the litany to be chanted over their demise, as most appropriate, is Psalm 73: 18, "Surely thou didst set them in slippery places; thou castedst them down unto destruction."

We noticed, however, on the icy night spoken of, that many who slipped did not fall. There was some one's arm to take hold of just in time to prevent a serious casualty. Because a Christian makes a bad slip, do not conclude that he has fallen. Laying hold of an arm omnipotent, he may recover himself and get safely through. But it is a fortunate thing, if Christians must fall at all, that they fall on their way toward home, as was the case with hundreds of people on pavements of that Sabbath night.

GOD'S TELEPHONE.

SERMONIC publication gives the people wide choice of pulpit ministration. In country villages there may be but one church, and the services may not be edifying; or in the city, circumstances may make it best to attend a church where the pulpit service is not edifying. Here comes your paper, which gives you a choice of pulpit ministrations. You pick up the paper and see a sermon; it does not suit you. Unless you are an infidel or a fool you will find something for your soul to feed on in every faithful sermonic publication in the weekly papers. Then such publication gives you a symmetrical presentation of the truth. One minister is full of soft sentimentality, and his religion is a jelly-fish. Another gives you nothing but the rigors of the Bible, and his religion is a javelin. The one man's sermon is all heart; the other's, all backbone. But put them together in the same column, the heart in its place and the backbone in its place, and you have a healthy organization. Morality is all that one man preaches. Faith is all that another man preaches. Put them side by side, and let the one tell you that you are saved by faith, and the other man tell you "faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone;" then you will have the whole truth, you will have a complete temple of truth—one man laying the solid foundation, another setting up the fluted columns, another springing the groined arch, and another ringing the Gospel chimes of invitation, inviting all to come and worship. So all together we shall complete the architecture of the temple.

Now, let us be frank in the Church of God, and acknowledge that the printing press is a mighty auxiliary of the Christian pulpit. "Go, teach all nations." How will you teach them? In every way possible. Sometimes by music, sometimes by tract, sometimes by newspaper. Who cares which way the people get the Gospel, if they only get it? Instead, therefore, of harsh criticism by the religious press of the secular press, and instead of great differences on the part of good people—sometimes they sneer at sermonic reporting in the secular press—let God be praised that the Gospel is carried every week on the wings of the secular press to those who would otherwise never see or hear the message. This is the telephone which God has set up to make all the churches and all the earth one great audience. Let the cylinder of the printing-press roll and the compositor continue to set up his six thousand "ems" a day. Place them all in line, the secular and religious press of the country and of Christendom, and at the command of God's Providence, rush these battering-rams against the walls of ignorance and sin until they fall flat as the walls of Jericho, thundered down by the Lord God of Joshua.

Have you never felt the grappling-hooks of the devil on your heart? Have you had no severe battle to fight with "the world, the flesh, and the devil?" Have there not been passes in your life when but for the grace of God you would have been utterly ruined and discomfited? O, do you not feel, you who have never experienced the power of God's grace, that you want some supernal help in the hour of grievous temptation? You all have your temptations. But Christ comes, and with his Divine arm holds you, and he declares you shall not be tempted above that you are able; but that with every temptation he will bring a way of escape, that you may be able to bear it. Do you not acknowledge the fact that you want Christ as a deliverer?

A PERSONAL APPEAL FROM T. DE WITT TALMAGE.

THE Brooklyn Tabernacle whose doors are set open, not only for its own people, but for hundreds of thousands of strangers every year, and in a course of years for millions of strangers of this and other lands, and free of charge, is about to be turned into a theatre or concert hall, and my pastorate here closed forever. Why? Because we have been compelled to build three immense churches, two of them having been destroyed by fire. That is explanation enough for all common-sense people. No congregation ever gathered could have endured such a process. We have a floating debt of one hundred and twenty-four thousand dollars. Seventy-five thousand dollars will pay it, through the kindness of creditors.

I appeal to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for help. If the response is like the magnificent response they made for the Russian Famine Fund, Brooklyn Tabernacle, the largest Protestant church in America, is saved for the cause of God, and my pastorate continues. If not, under the Sheriff's hammer, the church goes down. "Going! Going! Gone!"

To show that I am willing to do my share, after having given my services practically free for three years, I having received only about $625 over and above that which I have paid out for the church, I hereby enclose through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the Brooklyn Tabernacle Emergency Fund, my check for Ten Thousand dollars to pay the last ten thousand of the entire floating debt.

Let all monies be sent to the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and not to me. Yours, T. DE WITT TALMAGE.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

YOUNG CONVERTS.

THE devil is getting more followers from the ranks of the Church to do devilish things, than from his own crowd. And why? Well! because the young converts are not looked after as they should be. Let a person be converted, then run the Christian race a little while and fall back, and the wickedness of his life is, as a rule, ten-fold greater than before conversion.

Young converts should have all the care and watchfulness of babes; and that means much. Ask any mother what it means to tend a babe for the first six months or a year of its life. Nursing, bathing, dressing, petting, rocking, watching. Oh! I wish the preachers and the deacons of the Church could be mothers for just once! I think they would know what it means to take care of babes in Christ.

What Friendship Means.

A study of the fifteenth verse of the fifteenth chapter of John will be no wasted time. It will open up the subject of "Friendship." Henry Clay Trumbull has written a book on the "Master Passion," and it will do you good to turn its pages, but better still to apply its lessons.

Friendship means more than kind words when all is going well. A smile in return for a smile is of little value. The friends I want are the ones who will help me: help me be a better man; reprove me when needed; cheer me when jaded; encourage me when disheartened; lift with me when the dead weight of trouble is on my shoulders; give me money when I am in need, and buy the flowers for me before I get in my coffin.

Friends who will stick amid storms of any and every kind; who will stand by me when Job's experience comes; who will see the good in me, and help to bring it out; who will help me to crush out the bad. Such a friend, who cares more for me than for Mrs. Grundy.

Oh! the depths of that word, "Friendship!"

He Knows it All.

My heading does not refer to God, but to a man I have lately met in writing. He is telling how the masses are to be reached; and I am astounded at his wisdom and ability, and with it all, how many fools there are in the world; for everybody not working after his pattern is — is — is — well, "is on the wrong track," to put it mildly.

Oh, dear! when will men learn that God has not shut himself up to any one method, or set of methods, or set of men; or machines, or set of machines? What is the use of a fellow with a little church yelling away at the fellow with a big church, telling him, "little churches only can reach the crowd?" Why should the man with a fine edifice and nice pews and a big organ, cry out against the man who takes a hall, and gathers in those who only will go there—or the ordained and set-apart fellow throw mud at the Salvation Army lassie who goes to the slums, where he never was born to go, or if he does go, will have to be born again?

I just write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reader to say, beware of the man who "knows it all," who has the only way of reaching people with truth. He needs to be reached himself, with the truth of 1. Corinthians 12: which is the "Gift Chapter," and there he will discover that one may possess by divine right what another has not. And if anything is true it's this, that there is a difference between a hoe and an ax; but the farmer does well to have both on his farm.

Mr. Long-Tongue.

I have met this man, or his wife (I cannot tell them apart), and if he or she is to be in heaven, I want my mansion on some other street than theirs: unless a second work of grace is wrought before they enter the portals. I really think their hearts have been converted, but as to this one member, there is no question but it's yet in the control of Satan, or a score of his imps. They have brains too: quite a lot, I should say; but there is seemingly no connection between the brain and the tongue; if there is, it don't work; or if it does work, it works too slow; for the tongue gets in first, always.

If they would just talk about some good thing, it would be all right; but like people of this class, their eyes have a peculiar squint which enable them to see defects only, and eye and tongue are in league for destruction.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE RUSSIAN CRIME.

CABLE dispatches on March 21st announced that a deplorable crime had been committed in the ancient city of Moscow. While M. Alexieff, the mayor of the city, was presiding at a meeting of the City Council, a man entered the Council Chamber and asked to speak with him privately. M. Alexieff went to ascertain his business and the man drew a revolver and shot him in the stomach. It is difficult to imagine what could have been the assassin's motive for the crime, as the mayor has proved an exceptionally good official. He was public spirited and philanthropic to a remarkable degree. He had been in office eight years and during that time had devoted the whole of his salary of six thousand dollars a year to charity. He had also been most efficient in the discharge of his duties, had given the city an excellent system of drainage and provided for a good water supply. When the city was threatened with a visitation of cholera last year, he had it thoroughly cleansed at his own expense, and, while the work was in progress, he personally superintended the scavengers, spending twenty-one hours of the twenty-four in going from place to place to see that the work was being thoroughly done. In his conduct of his private business he was similarly thoughtful of others. In taking on new employes, his foremen were instructed to engage those who most needed employment, especially widows with families. When Mr. Klopsch and Dr. Talmage visited Moscow last year to distribute the relief generously provided by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for the famine sufferers, he entertained them hospitably, and manifested hearty sympathy with their mission. The murder of so exemplary a man has caused general surprise. It could not have been caused by personal enmity, as the assassin was a stranger to the mayor. The police charge the crime to the Nihilists, and their contention is confirmed by the fact that they found on his person a slip of paper bearing the words, "The lot has fallen on you." This would indicate that the mayor's death is a penalty for his loyalty to the Czar, with whom he was a great favorite. The Nihilists have of late been striking down the Czar's friends, apparently with the hope that he will be alarmed on his own account and institute reforms. It shows how deeply ingrained in the human mind is the idea of vicarious sacrifice. As in the case of the Phœnix Park murders and the assassination of Lincoln and Garfield, the crime seems to have been conceived in the hope that, by sacrificing an innocent person, a whole people might be benefited. Caiaphas had the same idea when the death of Jesus was plotted (John 11: 50.)

A Count's Troubles.

A prisoner who was convicted in the Municipal Court of Boston, Mass., on March 2 of defrauding a hotel of his board bill, tells a romantic story, the truth of which was proved by documents in his possession. He is a French Count, the son of a wealthy nobleman. About three years ago he met a Belgian lady in Paris, to whom he became engaged. She was very beautiful and fascinating, and his father, after seeing her, approved of the match. After a few months, however, he discovered that he had made an unwise choice. He dissolved the engagement, but, not wishing to injure her, did not disclose his reasons to any one, not even his father. The lady turned his magnanimity to her own advantage. She carried her story to the father who is an old man and very susceptible. She completely captivated him and incensed him against his son. Under her influence the old man wrote his son, ordering him to fulfil his engagement or be cast off and disowned. The son was deeply pained by his father's letter, and being too proud to explain, quitted the country and came to America. He thought that being well educated he could easily support himself. He had, however, no special knowledge that could be put to practical use. He could not get employment, and sank into such poverty that he was glad to accept work in a cotton-mill, at one dollar a day. His habits had not fitted him to live on so small an income, and he got into difficulties which eventually resulted in his arrest for defrauding the hotel. He is certainly in pitiable circumstances, and his trouble is all the greater because it is through his father's misunderstanding him that he is deprived of his love and confidence. Happily, the Christian is safe from that possibility. When all men misconstrue his conduct and accuse him falsely, he can rely on his heavenly Father and say, as Job did, "He knoweth the way that I take" (Job 23: 10.)

A Conscientious Executor.

AN extraordinary suit is now pending in the Superior Court of New York State. It has arisen out of a dispute over the validity of a will. The will was drawn by the testator himself. It bequeaths the bulk of his large fortune to the children of an adopted daughter. The remainder is devoted to small legacies to his brothers and sisters and to a few charitable institutions. There is much ambiguity in the phraseology of the will and there were other grounds for questioning its validity. One of the testator's brothers was made executor, and he insists that the will is valid and proposes to execute its provisions as he understands them. His brothers and sisters, however, have interposed, and have brought suit to have the will set aside and have the estate divided under the intestate law. The executor has secured able counsel and is prepared to make a vigorous fight to uphold the will. He has been reminded that if the will is broken, he will receive over one hundred thousand dollars, which will go to strangers if he wins his suit. To this consideration, however, he pays no attention, and is defending the will that disinherits himself. A man whose conduct is governed by right and conscience and not by considerations of personal interest belongs to the nobility of the earth, and is akin to him who pleased not himself, but gave his life a sacrifice for others. (Mark 10: 45.)

MOSCOW, RUSSIA, AND PORTRAIT OF MAYOR ALEXIEFF, RECENTLY ASSASSINATED.

A Fatal Treasure.

A REMARKABLE fatality occurred at a fire in Philadelphia on March 19. Three adjoining houses were burned early that morning. On the third floor of the second house two girls were sleeping in the same room. They were awakened by the smell of smoke and the crackling of burning wood. They rose and rushed to the head of the stairs, but their escape by that way was cut off, as the stairs were already on fire. There was another staircase, and the girls ran to it at the top of their speed, fearing lest that too might be on fire. But the flames had not reached it and they made their way quickly to the street, arousing the other inmates of the house as they went down. After the fire was extinguished, the firemen found a charred figure in the girls' room, beside the open drawer of a bureau. In the drawer was ninety-seven dollars in gold. An examination revealed the fact that the charred figure was the burned corpse of one of the two girls, who had escaped. She had returned to rescue her savings and had been overcome by the smoke, and, falling on the floor, had been burned to death. Probably the money was all she had in the world and she would naturally be reluctant to lose it. But she had better have lost that than her life. It is sometimes difficult to get the awakened sinner to take that view of his situation. Rather than lose the soul, it is better to make any sacrifice, though it be of something as precious as a right hand or a right eye. (Matt. 18: 8, 9.)

A Weak Foundation.

Two imposing business houses in New York were seriously injured last week by a singular accident. Formerly, two much more humble houses occupied their site, but at different times the two handsome edifices have been built from the ground up. When they were erected, it was difficult to get at the foundations, as both were built on the same party wall. The owners therefore contented themselves with building a separate and independent wall above the level of the street, and they ran them up very high, according to the custom of late in the city. On the night of March 17, a policeman passing the place heard a loud crash, and saw the plate glass windows in both stores suddenly shattered into thousands of pieces. No one was near to do the mischief, but it was easy to see what had caused it. Each house had a list of several inches from the level. The house on the north leaned toward the south, and the southern house leaned toward the north. The foundation wall on which both houses depended for support had crumbled under a weight it was not intended to bear, and the massive upper walls of both houses had sunk. Efforts will be made to repair the damage, but experienced builders think that it may be necessary to pull both houses down and rebuild them on independent and more substantial foundations. Such calamities are not without parallel in the realm of morals. Sudden wealth, or popularity, or political eminence coming upon a nature fitted for humble life is apt to try the foundations of character, and if they are not built on the one Rock, to lead, as we have seen recently in Europe, to moral and social ruin. (1 Cor. 3: 11.)

Music Spoiled.

A PIANOFORTE manufacturer in Boston, Mass., describes a strange experience he is having in one district of the city. He has received requests from citizens to examine their pianos as they have become useless. The trouble in all cases was much alike. When the keys were struck, the hammers struck the strings several times in a helpless fashion, marring the music. He knew that such an effect must be due to some defect in the tapes which hold the hammers in place. He was puzzled by discovering in the first piano he attempted to set right, that the tapes had wholly disappeared. He could not understand what had become of them until he took the piano to pieces. Then he found that a family of mice had settled in the piano and had used the tapes to make their nest. A bunch of tapes chewed into pulp, as large as a cocoa-nut, was at the bottom of the instrument, forming a comfortable bed for a number of young mice. Since then, he has found a number of pianos reduced to silence by the same cause. In that district of the city, the mice have either simultaneously discovered this new use for piano-tapes, or have in some way communicated the fact to each other. Evidently piano-owners there and elsewhere will do well to guard against the little pests, by preventing their getting access to the interior of their instruments. Similar vigilance is needed in the Church, and the family, and the individual life, to prevent the harmony being spoiled. Evil thoughts and what are called, little sins, if they once gain entrance and remain, soon produce discord. (Cant. 2: 15.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Salvation Army has purchased for $200,000 the site of its barracks on Fourteenth Street near Sixth Avenue, New York, and will erect there a four-story building as the headquarters of the United States contingent.

Bishop Tucker of Equatorial Africa, announces the discovery of the remains of the murdered Bishop Hannington. They were found under an old ammunition box buried beneath a half-demolished hut. The skull was plainly recognisable.

Mr. Isaac V. Brokaw has given $50,000 to the Madison Avenue Reformed Church in New York, with which it will erect a new mission building on the East side of the city. It will contain a school large enough to accommodate 1,200 children, a chapel, rooms for rescue work and a day nursery.

Rev. E. P. Telford closes this week his services at Clinton Ave. Reformed Church, Newark, N. J. The meetings have been very largely attended. Fully a thousand persons have been present at the meetings for men. Rev. Daniel H. Martin, the pastor of the church, has cordially co-operated with the Evangelist in the movement.

Major Hilton's Gospel Mission at Los Angeles, Cal., is growing in power and usefulness. Both the spiritual and philanthropic departments are in active operation. The monthly reports show how great a blessing it has proved to the city in relieving the poor and reclaiming the fallen.

The Rescue Mission at 70 Springfield Avenue, Newark, N. J., has been doing valuable work in reclaiming lost and degraded characters who frequent the neighborhood. Mr. Walter James Lovell, who has taken a deep interest in the effort, writes us that the managers are in urgent need of money to continue their work. Any assistance rendered them will be gratefully received.

Dr. B. Labaree, who has been a missionary in Persia for many years, is now in this country for rest and recuperation. He is anxious to enlist the people and the government, in an effort to obtain some relief from the Russian Government for the persecuted Stundists. At the Monday lecture in Boston, Mass., where he spoke, a resolution was passed urging an appeal to the Czar on behalf of these much suffering people.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has moved the whole town of Muscatine, Iowa, by the united meetings he has been holding there. The Daily News-Tribune says that they were the greatest ever held there, not in size only but in their results. The paper has been publishing daily reports of the sermons and recording the growing number of converts. All the evangelical churches of the town will receive accessions of membership.

The programme of the World's Congress of Missions, to be held in connection with the World's Fair, is already printed, and correspondence is going on with influential friends of Missions in England, France, India, Africa, China, Germany and this country, to speak on the great subject which will be brought before the gathering, from September 28 to October 5 inclusive. It is hoped that Canon Farrar, Mr. McAll of Paris, Rev. George F. Pentecost, Rev. Charles F. Parkhurst, D. L. Moody and many other eminent men will take part.

A convention to organize a national association of Open Air Workers is called for April 17, at 2:30 P.M. It will be held in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, New York. All men and women engaged in, or interested in open-air Christian work, whether in preaching on street corners, or in Gospel wagon work or tent work are invited to attend. Among the signatures on the call for the convention are those of Drs. A. J. Gordon, Josiah Strong, Teunis S. Hamlin, R. A. Torrey, A. F. Schauffler and A. C. Dixon.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE WONDERFUL TOMB.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, on Easter Sunday morning, April 2, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Matthew 28 : 6 "Come, see the place where the Lord lay."

ONCE more we greet to-day with garland, song and prayer, our risen, victorious and ever blessed Redeemer. We prostrate ourselves at his feet, while "All Hail" salutes his ear. Every Sunday is the Lord's day, and commemorates his resurrection; but it is fitting that once a year we should earnestly and tenderly emphasize this glorious fact. We dislike the name Easter. It is connected with the Anglo-Saxon goddess E-tera and Ostara; a deity once the object of heathen worship. This was the goddess of light and spring, in whose honor a festival was celebrated in April, and this month came to be known as Ostarmanoth or Easter month. It was natural to compare the sunrise and the spring time to the new light and life in the resurrection of Jesus Christ. There is no doubt a transfer of the celebration of this heathen deity to the observance of the resurrection of our Lord. But even as Dr. Schaff suggests, are often unconscious prophecies of Christian truths. The objection to this name might be made also to the names of the days of the week and of the months of the year. They are of heathen origin, and we might well oppose their use if there was any possibility of discontinuing the same by the selection of Christian substitutes.

The significance of Easter, it is difficult to overestimate. It is the Christian Passover, and the oldest and greatest of all the holy days of the Christian Church. Its observance can be traced to the first century of our era. It ought to be a time of holy joy, of devout thanksgiving and of joyous expectation. It is not surprising that in some branches of the early Church the preceding night was spent in reading the Scriptures, in singing joyous hymns and in offering devout prayers until the dawn of Easter morning. In this way the transition from the deep sorrow caused by meditating on Christ's death to the great joy in his resurrection as the Prince of Life was made in that early day. Church historians tell us that large numbers of pagans were accustomed to join with Christians in these services, watching together for the dawn of the resurrection morning. It was long believed that Christ would on this morning come again in power and in glory. In the Russian Church, after impressive ceremonies during the night, the day begins with the jubilant salutation, "The Lord is risen;" and the joyous response is made, "He is risen indeed." To-day angels might well sing anew their songs of praise to their Lord and our Redeemer; to-day the First Begotten from from the conflict crowned with victory; to-day hell and the grave are defeated; to-day the kingdom of darkness is spoiled; to-day the Son of man is declared with power to be the Son of God; to-day the Church wears the robes and crown of royalty and glory. All [illegible] forth bearing in his girdle the keys of death and hell and wearing on his brow the crown [illegible] Memorial Day there much of [illegible] thoughts of gratitude and love, of certain [illegible]

It will be profitable for us to meditate for a little on the myth[illegible] It is interesting to observe, at the outset, that it is the invitation of an angel. The angels [illegible] heaven to become the Saviour of men. Angels followed him on his downward journey from the throne of God to the manger in Bethlehem. They made, in solo and in chorus, celestial music on the night when the Christ was born. Doubtless they were often with him during his earthly sojourn. We may well believe that they honored the scene of his baptism by their seraphic presence. We know that they ministered unto him amid the trials, the humiliations, and the agonies of Gethsemane; and now we find them

Keeping Watch at His Grave.

One at the head and the other at the foot of the place where the Lord had lain. An angel rolled back the stone from the door and sat upon it, an angel whose countenance was like lightning and whose raiment was white as snow. No wonder that at that great sight the keepers did shake and become as dead men; but when the devout loving women approached, the angels had for them messages of tender encouragement and of earnest hope. The angels knew well whom these women sought. They, therefore, invite them to come that they may see the place where the Lord lay. Later, angels command them to go and tell his disciples that he has risen from the dead. Angels felt honored in being the servants of their Lord and the servants of his people. He is their king as he is ours. Perhaps he is not their Saviour as he is ours; but nevertheless they owned his authority and gave him the reverence which is his due. We might well imagine the conversation which was held by these angels as they spoke to each other while watching by his grave. They rejoiced in honoring the spot which was honored by their Lord and Master while he lay in the power of death and the grave. We may well listen to this angelic invitation and go under this heavenly guidance to the place where our Lord lay.

The Tomb of Deity.

It is also the tomb of the greatest visitant which earth or Hades ever knew. Christ was King of men as he is the Lord of heaven. His tomb is the shrine of the loftiest genius as truly as the altar of the tenderest love. Men visit with softened tread the tombs of earth's heroes, whether it be that of a Napoleon, a Lincoln or a Grant, but never was there a tomb so conspicuously that of gentleness and greatness, of lottiness and lowliness, of divinity and humanity as is the tomb of Jesus Christ. Tell us not of Palestine's tombs of the kings, not of India's glorious Taj, not of Italy's Campo Santo, not of Russia's Tombs of the Czars, not of France's Pere La Chaise, not of Scotland's Necropolis or Greyfriars' churchyard, not of England's Frogmore and Westminster Abbey, Joseph's tomb is the tomb of humanity and the tomb of divinity. It is the unique tomb of the world. The world is now beginning to recognize him as its profoundest thinker, its wisest leader, and its divinest sufferer. He is ruling the thoughts of men to-day with a kingly sceptre and with irresistible power. The world will never go beyond the Sermon on the Mount, either for breadth of thought, clearness of vision, tenderness of statement, or divineness of spirit. Christ rules to-day as king on the throne because once he died as a sacrifice on the Cross. This is the tomb of the world's greatest Man. Compared with him all other great men shrink into significance, and the lustre of their genius is lost in darkness. Why will men worship heroes and refuse to give the homage of their hearts to Jesus Christ? Why will men glorify the destroyers of life and refuse to give their love to him who came not to destroy, but to save? Why will they glorify weak and sinful men, and refuse to give glory to him whose perfection as man is without spot, and whose divinity is clearly proved by his perfect humanity? This is

A Sweet and Blessed Spot

We cannot accept this invitation literally today because the hand of time, the hand of the infidel, and the hand of the vandal has so obscured the place that we cannot be sure of its location. Little did the angels who first gave that invitation know that it would sound through the ages to come, and would finally reach our ears in this far-off land and in this distant century. The invitation is sweet to our ears, notwithstanding the uncertainties regarding the locality and the changes in the characteristics. Never was grave so charmful as that of the Son of God. He has perfumed it by his presence. Sweeter breath than that borne upon the gales of Ceylon salutes us as we are conscious of that holy fragrance of that blessed tomb. Our divine Lord never saw corruption. Sweet and blessed is this tomb. Voiceful is it in its silence, and eloquent in its emptiness as with the loving women we draw near to it this morning in obedience to the invitation of the angels.

A Costly Tomb.

Standing beside this empty tomb there is much of interest that we may observe. The now sainted Spurgeon, in one of his earlier sermons, called attention to the fact that it is a costly tomb. He was quite right in emphasizing this fact. No common grave was that of our divine Lord. His was not the grave of a pauper; he was buried in no potter's field; his was truly the tomb of a King. The prophecy was made seven hundred years before that he should make "his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death." Nothing apparently could be more unlikely of fulfilment than the ancient prophecy; but it was fulfilled to the very letter. A princely tomb was the tomb of the Prince of life. This fact is the more wonderful when we remember that in life he had not where to lay his head. No sumptuous palace was his, no crown of gold, no sandals of silver were his. Why does he not fill a pauper's grave? Why should he be with the rich in his death? Why should many difficulties in the fulfilment of that ancient prophecy be overcome that our divine Lord might sleep in a new and costly tomb? Is there not here a sweet suggestion for every true believer? If Jesus is to be buried the rich Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus of the Sanhedrin shall assist in that burial. His work of expiation is now finished. No more shall shame, buffeting, and reproach be visited upon his sacred person. When he said, "It is finished," his experience of the contempt, contumely, and ignominy of men is ended. His body will be embalmed with precious spicery and robed in costly shroud for and not the tomb of disgrace. Courtly hands will bear the sacred head, and womanly tenderness will wipe the pierced brow; and thus with love and reverence will the sacred body be laid in the new-hewn sepuchre. Loving hearts will follow as mourners, and the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea will become the tomb of Jesus the King.

We observe also that this tomb is in a garden. This is indeed a striking circumstance. It is a strange place for a tomb. Not in gardens do we ordinarily expect to find tombs. It is true that occasionally the tombs of kings were in gardens, but such occasions were rare and were associated with princely splendor and royal greatness. As we look about us we see clearly that this is no place of graves. Here are no other memorials of the dead; there is but a single tomb and that in a garden. There is here a strange mingling of opposites. Gardens suggest life, growth, beauty; tombs suggest decay, death, corruption. This mingling of opposites is suggestive of all experiences of life. Every garden in life has its tomb, whether it be the garden of the heart, of the home, or of the Church. Every path leads to some tomb. This fact is the sad side of earthly experience; but there is a bright side as truly as there is a dark side. For while there is a tomb in every garden there may be

A Garden Around every Tomb.

That fact is inexpressibly sweet. Meet it was that Christ, the Lord of life and glory, should be buried in a garden. Was it not in a garden that sin and death were born? Ought it not to be in a garden that sin and death should die, and life and love should have a new birth to die no more? In Eden death won his first victory, and in the garden near Calvary, death received his last stroke from the great Conqueror. This garden suggests the other garden, the paradise of God where sin can never enter; where sorrow is unknown, and where love lives on rejoicing in the immediate presence of God.

If we observe more closely we shall see that the grave clothes are orderly arranged, and the napkin is laid in a place by itself. These facts are full of suggestion to every thoughtful mind. We see clearly that this tomb was not rifled, that Christ did not hastily arise, and that loving hands disposed of the cerements of the grave, and folded by itself the napkin that was around his thorn-pierced brow. Doubtless our Lord showed in this way his appreciation of order and propriety, and thus taught lessons of homely instruction while he was proving truths of highest and divinest importance. Clumsy was the story told by the soldiers, that his disciples stole him away while they slept. The condition of the tomb is itself the contradiction of their foolish affirmation. Glorious was the rising from the grave, and amid its majestic elements was the regard for the proprieties of life in these humble details. No human eye saw Christ arise; the angels did not say that they saw him rise. Evermore in silence are God's sublimest deeds wrought. Perhaps when the angel rolled away the stone and sat upon it, the divine Lord came forth, without haste, without confusion, in the calmness of conscious power, and in the majesty of divine achievement.

All the surroundings of the tomb are full of suggestion. It was cut in a rock, as was fitting for the temporary resting place of him who is the Rock of Ages. It was a new tomb, as became him of virgin mother born, and of unique life as well as birth. Had another ever been buried in that tomb it might have been claimed, as in the case of the man who touched Elisha's bones, that so Christ arose from the dead; but none other ever slept in that tomb. It was reserved for the exclusive use of the mighty monarch of death's domain as of earth's dominion. We may well bless God for all the circumstances of that wondrous burial, that costly tomb and this glorious resurrection. Joseph intended the tomb for his own family; but it became the tomb of heaven's King and so is immortal among the tombs of earth.

An Empty Tomb.

We observe also, and chiefly, that this is now an empty tomb. The angels invite the women to come that they may behold the place where the Lord lay, not where the Lord lies. This is the greatest and sublimest truth ever taught the children of men. The doctrine of our Lord's resurrection is the foundation stone of the Christian Church; and that stone is laid practically in the empty grave of Jesus Christ. Nothing is more certain than that Jesus Christ was truly dead. In that rocky tomb, motionless and dead, the mighty Redeemer lay; and nothing is more certain than that this dead Christ arose from the grave to die no more. As well might we attempt to deny the existence of Cæsar or Napoleon as the resurrection of Jesus Christ, than that no historical event is more certain. He burst Cæsar's seal, and proved that the rocky walls of Joseph's tomb could not imprison the Lord of life and glory.

The resurrection of Christ has changed the literature, the sculpture, the painting and the music of the Church and of the world. It teaches us great lessons, some of which we do well to emphasize as we stand to-day beside this empty tomb. We here receive conclusive proofs of the divine nature of the Redeemer. Proofs enough he gave during his lifetime that he was truly the Son of God and the Saviour of men. But his words were misunderstood, misinterpreted and rejected. His resurrection, however, must convince all candid inquirers, and at least silence all captious cavilers. This effect it seems to have produced when the apostles first went forth to declare the mighty fact. Christ had himself rested all his claims to be the Son of God upon of his resurrection. Had he not been truly the Son of God he never would have come forth from the tomb of Joseph. When challenged to give a proof of his claims, he referred to his own resurrection from the dead. His resurrection was, therefore, a fulfilment of his own prophecies, as well as the working of the greatest of miracles.

His resurrection is also a proof that his work of atonement was accepted by God the Father. It was the Father's seal upon the atoning work of the Son. Not on the cross, but rather in the tomb did that work reach its completion. In the tomb the great battle was fully fought and the sublime victory gloriously won. Then it was that the son of David was declared with power to be the Son of God. Then it was that the foundation of Christ's reign among men was laid. Other founders of religion lived and died, but Christ is the only founder a religion who came forth from the grave. His resurrection is the unique fact in our holy faith; it is the divine proof of its absolute certainty. It carries with it all the facts of his birth, his life, his death. His resurrection has justly been called "God's amen and the hallelujah of humanity." It gives us a striking proof of his divinity. To the teachers of Christianity constantly appealed; to be the witnesses of his resurrection was one of the objects for which the apostles were appointed. In his great sermon on the day of Pentecost, the Apostle Peter affirms, "This Jesus hath God raised up whereof we all are witnesses." Paul, addressing the men of Athens affirms that, "He hath given assurance until all men in that he hath raised him from the dead." To this same miracle the teachers of Christianity may now refer as proof of its supernatural claims. It is the key-stone in the arch of our faith. If it be true all other affirmations of that faith may be easily proved.

The doctrine of the resurrection also accounts for the existence of the Church. We know that the Christian faith has transformed the world; but we cannot account for the Christian Church, except we admit the resurrection of the Lord. Were the first teachers of this new faith deceivers? Who dare so affirm? Were they deceived? Who can so believe? Deny the resurrection and you cannot account for the Church. This fact any man may safely affirm in the presence of any student of history. You may safely challenge any man who denies the resurrection of Christ to account for the existence of the Church. No sensible man will accept the challenge. Nothing is more logical or sublime than the Apostle Paul's reasoning in 1. Cor. 15th chapter, when he says that if Christ be not risen our faith is in vain. But he gloriously affirms that Christ is risen, and he exults in the fact that our faith is not vain.

One other and more personal lesson we may learn as we stand beside this empty grave—Christ's resurrection is of our resurrection. He is the only one instance of a complete victory over death in his own person. He met death in his own domain and won in that dark territory his glorious victory. Hitherto Death was an inexorable tyrant never bribed by tears and never melted by beauty. He struck his deadly blow and humanity fell before his power. Enoch and Elijah really won no victory over death, for they never really grappled with this foe. They were translated without meeting him on the field of conflict. There is, as we have seen during the past three weeks, proof that the ruler's daughter, the widow's son and Lazarus were rescued for a time from the power of death; but death afterward claimed them for his own. Christ alone of woman born ever grappled with the mighty wrestler death, and overcame him in his own dark domain. Death never before had such a visitant in his silent realms. Jesus wrenched the sceptre of empire from his hand, and took the crown of dominion from his brow. Jesus won a full and a final victory leaving the sepulchre that morning to return no more forever. Nothing but that empty tomb remained to tell that once the Son of God slept on this rocky bed.

We thus have a sweetly personal interest in this victory. Christ won it not for himself alone. As he died for us so

He Rose for Us.

The good Shepherd ever goeth before his sheep. Our resurrection depends upon his. Fast as the grave seems now to shut in our beloved, it is doomed to relax its grasp. An angel shall visit all the tombs of earth, as angels visited the tomb of Jesus, and these tombs like his must give up their dead. When men say that the scientific objections are such that they cannot believe in the doctrine of the resurrection, we have simply to ask them, Did Jesus rise? This is a question of fact. Is it true? There are, all admit, difficulties in the doctrine of our resurrection. They are inexplicable; but were there not also difficulties in the resurrection of Christ? The difficulties in the case of a general resurrection are not greater, from a strictly scientific point of view, then those in the case of the resurrection of Jesus. To believe that he died and rose again is scientifically as difficult as to believe that we die and may rise again. He who denies that the dead can rise must also deny that Christ did rise. "But now is Christ risen." Then we, too, may arise. Empty as was Joseph's tomb, so empty shall all the tombs of the world be when the archangel's trump shall sound. All hail, then, thou risen Jesus! Thou art he who once was dead, but who now liveth forevermore. At thy girdle are the keys of death and hell. March forward, thou mighty Conqueror, in thy sublime victory! Let all the bells of heaven ring on this glad Easter morning. With thee we bear the cross; with thee we shall be buried in the grave; with thee we shall rise in triumph; and with thee we shall sit on thy throne to die no more, but to rejoice evermore in the triumphs thou hast won—thou Christ of God, blessed forevermore!

IT PASSETH KNOWLEDGE.

NO tongue can tell, nor pen indite
The love of Christ, the Infinite;
'Tis high as heaven, than hell more deep—
The love which caused those eyes to weep:
Boundless as God's Eternity,
Else it had ne'er reached down to me!

The joys of heaven my Lord forsook,
And of our mortal flesh partook;
Tho' rich for us, became he poor,
That we might enter heaven's door.
Such wondrous kindness as he felt
A heart of adamant might melt!

That tender heart was pierced with woe,
That we the love of God might know.
It braved men's deadly hate and scorn,
And vanquished Satan's "hope forlorn."
His life, his love laid freely down
To win us an immortal crown!

Dost pity him? Thy load he bears,
Thy sins have caused his bitter tears,
In his own body and for thee
He groans and dies on yonder tree;
Haste, burdened one; to Jesus bow,
Awake! Arise! He calleth now!

CHRIST IS THE WAY.

"WHICH is the way?" a wayfarer said,
Looking o'er the many before him.
The bird voices from the sky had fled,
And deep clouds were gathering o'er him.
"The ways are many; how shall I know Along which one my poor soul should go?"

"Most of them have been chartered by man,
And I wist not where they may lead me;
Still I cannot take all—no man can—
And little the guides seem to heed me."
He wiped his brow and in sorrow cried,
"O, when shall my soul be satisfied?"

Darker and darker still grew the night,
The clouds, one by one, coming nearer;
Each path had a claim that each was right,
But never one ray made it clearer:
"Dear soul of mine, lift thy thoughts above,
There must come light from a Father's love."

Never did light that was prayed for fail:
Now it flooded his soul while pleading,
Moved the thick clouds like a thinning veil;
Light came with the darkness receding,
When he heard a voice those sweet words say:
"Christ is the Life and Christ is the Way."

THE COMING ANTICHRIST.

His Origin, Identity, Rise, Culmination and Destruction.

BY REV. WYNDHAM M. MADDEN.*

FROM an early period of the Divine Revelation and onward to the very end, there are distinct intimations given of one who is to be revealed as the great antagonist of the Church of God. Let an examination be made into some parts of the Psalms; let the more precise utterances of the prophet Daniel respecting the Little Horn be remembered; and I feel convinced that the existence of such an enemy will be allowed. Men have agreed to call this adversary by the name of Antichrist.

It would be interesting to know where, and in what manner, such an adversary of godliness will arise; and the Bible gives us some little information regarding this. The prophecies of the seventh of Daniel and the seventeenth of Revelation, prove that the Antichrist will spring up among the ten kingdoms of the Roman Empire. If you will examine and compare together the seventh and eighth chapters of the book of Daniel, you will see that the antichrist will most probably arise in the eastern division of the empire, from one of the four kingdoms into which the Grecian or Alexander's empire was divided.

There is an intimation in Daniel 11 of the manner of his rise. In that chapter I understand the history of one person to be detailed, from the commencement of the twenty-first verse to the conclusion; and that person I believe is to be Antichrist. If this be so, his beginning is obscure and insignificant. He is denominated here "a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honor of the kingdom." But though obscure and insignificant at first, he is cunning and crafty; for "he shall come in peaceably and obtain the kingdom by flatteries."

Then, having once obtained some footing, he will contrive the fall of three of the ten kings. This is told us in the seventh of Daniel. Yet it will be effected in such a manner, that whether the kings themselves are supplanted, and new ones raised in their places or not, the ten kingdoms will remain as before.

He eventually becomes the ruling head of the Roman Empire. The beast from the sea in Rev. 13, I consider to be the Antichrist as fully manifested; and as is generally allowed, he is therefore represented as the head of that empire. I gather that the Antichrist will at his commencement support and uphold Romanism. It may be that to a certain extent he will be identified with Romanism, and that he will be the means of raising that idolatrous system to an almost unparalleled prosperity: yet this will not last long; the conduct of the Antichrist is evidently only a scheme for securing his own aggrandizement. He will carry the woman as long as he cannot do without her, but when he can dispense with her assistance he will be ruled no more.

Then again, it is important to notice the connection of the Antichrist with Satan, which is of deep moment. The Antichrist will be under the guidance of Satan; nay more, will occupy Satan's seat; will reign for Satan in his character of the god of this world; will act by the energy of Satan; will acknowledge him; will probably worship him; will be, as far as that is possible, an incarnation of Satan; and in conjunction with the false prophet who has the power of working miracles, and with the old serpent himself, will seem at least to be blasphemously imitating the divine mystery of the Godhead.

Yet, when I say this, it must not be supposed that I think that the features most revolting to human nature, which we are apt to look upon as characteristic of Satan's rule, will be rife on earth; far from it. Satan, through the Antichrist, will then appear, not as the tyrannical oppressor of this world but as its god, to raise it to its best and most prosperous estate. His great agent in this work will profess himself, and be recognized as the world's Messiah, the coming man, of whom some people are wont to speak, really come; the man who will lead them where they never have been led before; who will give them an honor, and a glory they have dreamed of, but never realized; who will gratify all their tastes, even the most refined; who will please all their fancies, and flatter their vanities; and be the one universal representative of themselves. He will come in his own name, and men will receive him. There will be nothing to humble human nature in submitting to him; nay, the world will think that humanity has then gained its culminating point. Yes, and it will be its culminating point; its culminating point of evil, from which the Lord Jesus himself will hurl it down to its fitting judgment.

The historians of that day, like many of the historians of subsequent times, fixed their attention on battles, the affairs of kings and courts, and the rise and fall of dynasties, rather than on religious movements. HOW TO FIND GOD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 16. Job 23 : 3; Luke 11 : 9-13.

SUCCESS in seeking God depends on three conditions. One of them is the state of the seeker's mind. If he is seeking him with a wrong motive, or for a wrong purpose, or in a wrong spirit, his search will in all probability be unsuccessful.

A story is told of a merchant in an Oriental land, who was very regular in his prayers. Every morning, before he took his seat in his bazaar, he never failed to attend to his devotions. Whatever else he neglected, he never omitted to pray. Yet his transactions were knavish; and the inconsistency prompted a traveler to find out what was the character of his prayers. After much pressing, the merchant acknowledged that his prayer was, "Send me this day plenty of customers, with full pockets and empty heads." In our day and in our land, perhaps, no one would offer a prayer so transparently immoral; but, it is not improbable, that many seek God in the belief that there is no better way to worldly success than to have the Almighty for a friend. The very promise chosen for the second illustration of the topic, has led many to approach God with unworthy motives. We learn enough of the character of God, in the New Testament, to be sure that selfishness is abhorrent to him. Probably one reason why some souls fall back into sin, after being brought in under the preaching of men, who dwell chiefly on the misery of the lost, is due to the fact that their concern has mainly been to escape punishment. After the scare has passed away, the motive for a religious profession has vanished, and the world, in which selfishness reigns, is the most congenial atmosphere. The man who came to Christ to know what he should do to inherit eternal life received little more consideration from the Great Teacher, than he who went to him and said, "Speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me." The man who seeks God, because he feels it his duty, because he desires to be at peace with him, because he is conscious of spiritual inability to do what is right and because he longs for righteousness, will be sure to find him.

A second condition of success is earnestness. The Apostle Paul compares the successful seeker to the athlete training for Olympian contests. He is so anxious to win that he submits to restriction, to self-denial and to tests, which under other circumstances, would have been too irksome to be borne. Christ suggests the same idea in the man finding a treasure hid in a field and the merchantman seeking goodly pearls. He said that they sold all that they had to obtain the prize. The seeker after God must be ready to sacrifice habits, friendships, honor and all that is dearest that he may succeed.

The third condition is the Way. We may see God in nature and in Providence, but only as we see him in Christ do we find him with help to the soul. The power of the Creator, the majesty of the Monarch we recognize apart from Christ; but it is a loving Father that we seek and in him God is revealed. So sought, the seeker finds fulfilled the assurance that David gave to his son, "If thou seek him [illegible]

The members of the Young Men's Christian Association of Fort Wayne, Ind., are rejoicing in the release from a burden which has been pressing upon them for some time. They have succeeded in paying off the whole of the debt on their handsome building, a picture of which appears on this page. The history of the Association is one of remarkable prosperity. Though not organized until 1880 it has now a building worth forty-five thousand dollars absolutely its own. It was erected in 1888 and thirty thousand dollars of the cost had then been contributed. The members took a short breathing time after that effort and then, in 1800, set energetically to work to clear off the remaining indebtedness. That has now been accomplished and the Association freed from all obligations is prepared for vigorous aggressive Christian work. The building is well arranged and well furnished. It contains a spacious gymnasium with all the modern appliances and has an able and experienced instructor in athletics. It has also a reading-room and a Library of 1,200 volumes. The membership is now 374, but is likely to be largely increased now that the Association is in so prosperous a condition with improved facilities and advantages.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

At the third annual convention of the Jersey City League, held recently at Bayonne, N. J., it was officially announced that there are thirty Leagues and four Leagues of Christian Endeavor in the district. The aggregate membership is over 2,500. In the majority, a regular weekly prayer-meeting conducted by the members, is held before the Sunday evening service. Nearly five thousand dollars was raised by the societies during the year, some of which was used by the Mercy and Help departments, some given to the local churches and the balance devoted to general religious work. Of the total sum the Chapter of Emory Church, Jersey City, contributed $875; Bayonne Chapter, $505; Hoboken, $400; Centenary, $400 and Wortendyke, $300. The following were the officers elected for the year: President, J. V. Forster; Recording Secretary, Miss C. E. Johns; Corresponding Secretary, Rev. Edwin N. Crasto; Treasurer, Dr. Fred. G. Pitts.——In North Dakota, the Fargo District has been holding its second annual convention. The League is thriving at all the churches. The delegates entered heartily into the discussion of topics connected with the work and were evidently desirous of getting advice and suggestions for making the organization efficient in their local spheres. The President for the year is Mr. Eugene May; Secretary, A. A. Bentley; Treasurer, Roy Porte.——An excellent showing is made by the League of South St Church, Portsmouth, O. The members learned that there was much suffering in the city during the last spell of cold weather, coming unexpectedly at the end of the long winter. They extemporized a relief headquarters, where they received gifts of clothing and shoes which they gave out to the needy. They were surprised to find how many people in the city were glad to supply the articles when it was known that the Leaguers were ready to be almoners. Subsequently a coal fund was raised and about four hundred families received a much needed gift of fuel. This is Christ-like work, and it is matter for congratulation that the Church has an agency ready to meet such emergencies.

At Saginaw, Mich., the East side branch of the Young Men's Christian Association has made remarkable progress during the year. Ninety-eight new members have been received, raising the total membership to 512.

Mr. F. S. Arnot, the hero of the mission at Garenganze, Africa, is now in England, and has been delivering addresses at the Young Men's Christian Associations of various cities. Under the inspiration of his addresses many young men have pledged themselves to missionary work in Africa.

At Hastings, Neb., the Y. M. C. A. has organized a series of evangelistic meeting and engaged Rev. J. E. Wolfe to lead them. Already 144 persons, the majority of whom are young men, have made profession of faith.

The Young Men's Christian Association, of Glasgow, Scotland, has a total membership of 9,008, with an average attendance at the fellowship meetings for the study of the Bible of 4,307. The Association is making arrangements for a regular lecture on the books of the Bible, and Dr. Stalker has been invited to undertake the duty.

A Young Woman's Christian Association has just been organized in Detroit, Mich. The question as to whether the membership should be confined to evangelical churches gave rise to extensive discussion, being carried even into the newspapers, and aroused considerable feeling. It was finally decided, 200 to 27, so to restrict it.

The committee of the Young Women's Christian Association at Hastings England, is endeavoring to secure a larger house. Between 500 and 600 business girls, school teachers, and others from London, &c., have been accommodated in the Home each year, seeking rest and change, and the workers feel increasingly the uncomfortable and inadequate size of the present house. A beautifully situated house, in every way most suitable, has been offered privately for sale for $25,000 and the Association is hopeful of buying it.

LIFE'S DAY.

Suggested by reading Dr. Talmage's Sermon: "From Twenty to Seventy."

IN the fresh, sweet-scented dawn
Of our life's bright, sunny morn.
Oh, the dream!
Blissful dream!
Of a true heart all our own;
Of a life work nobly done;
Of an easy victory won;
Thus we dream.

When we pause, surprised, at noon,
At the mid-day come so soon,
How we pray!
Wildly pray!
In the midst of battle's din,
In the midst of doubt and sin,
Who shall conquer? Who shall win?
So we pray.

At the tender twilight's fall,
Listening for the Father's call,
Now we trust,
Only trust!
Has the day been dark or bright,
Great our burdens been or light,
We are victors in His sight,
If we trust. —JENNIE A. CROFT.

The Deaconess Homes.

They are now Multiplying Throughout the Union and Doing a Noble Work for Christ —A Glimpse of Life in One of the Homes

EVERY passing year broadens the field of humanitarian effort in this Christian land of ours. There is a steady increase in the ranks of those who consecrate themselves to God's work among the poor and the suffering and the spiritually ignorant. Colleges, training schools, and Homes are multiplying at such a pace that it is inevitable that before another generation passes, a great moral uplift will have been experienced by the people of this Union.

Among the most interesting and by no means the least important of the agencies now at work are the Deaconess Homes and Training schools of the M. E. Church, one of which is represented in the illustration on this page. The first Deaconess Home in this country was established in Chicago about ten years ago. The General Conference shortly afterward authorized the institution of the "Order of Deaconesses," and there are now Deaconess Homes in Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Colorado Springs, Denver, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Omaha, St. Louis, St. Paul, Buffalo, Detroit, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Syracuse, Washington, Chicago and New York. Mrs. Lucy Rider Meyer was the founder of the Chicago Home. The Superintendent of the New York Institution is Miss Isabelle A. Reeves, who is a lady of kindly benevolence and gentle manner, with deep devotion to the work in which she is engaged. There are usually in the New York Home from twelve to fifteen inmates training for the work. Miss Layton, the first Superintendent, had previously been engaged in missionary work in India, and now sleeps on the banks of the Ganges near the city of Cawnpore. Some of the graduates of the Home have gone out on missionary service and still others are filling out their lives with a like consecrated work at home. Although in the Deaconess Home at 241 West 14th Street, New York, the force of laborers is totally inadequate, compared with the extent of the field, the work actually accomplished in a year is something surprising. In 1892, 14,137 calls and visits were made; the Nurse Deaconess, made over 1,000 calls at hospitals, the Tombs, the Penitentiary and at the sick-rooms in the tenement districts. 1,109 garments were distributed to the poor, and hundreds of dollars spent for food, medicine and delicacies for the sick. Cottage and children's meetings were conducted, Sunday School and industrial classes taught, surgical cases attended, and employment secured for the idle.

The training system of the Deaconess Homes is a magnificent preparation for the active career of a Christian worker, either at home or abroad, combining as it does, both practical and theoretical knowledge. It embraces lectures on elementary medicine and nursery, church history, hygiene, surgery, dentistry, elocution, temperance and kindergarten. While in the Training School the pupils wear no uniforms, but on becoming Deaconesses and entering on actual work, they adopt a distinctive dress, plain and inconspicuous. Their work is not confined to any denomination, but it is their pleasure and privilege to help all sects alike. It is impossible to estimate the good that is done by these consecrated women. Their self-sacrifice can never be measured by human appreciation. They enter the Training School after their twenty-first year, and are received on trial for a month. After a year of study, (at a merely nominal cost of $100 for board, fuel and light, tuition being free), they can, if they so desire, become Deaconesses, and be supported the second year by the Home. Arrangements are made whereby young women feeling called to Christian work can be admitted without expense. Two afternoons each week are devoted to house visiting in addition to the other forms of Christian work. Among those who address the students during the term are Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, Mrs. Bottome, Rev. Dr. A. F. Schauffler, Rev. Bishop E. G. Andrews, President Buttz of Drew Theological Seminary, and others.

THE NEW YORK DEACONESS HOME AND TRAINING SCHOOL, M. E. CHURCH.

Rev. Theodore Fluldner, a Lutheran Pastor in Germany, first conceived the idea of establishing an Order of Deaconesses for charitable work in that country. The scheme was afterward successfully adopted in England and it now promises to be one of the greatest and most efficient aids to church work in this country. The motto of the Deaconesses is "For Jesus's Sake." No vows are exacted of them on entering the Home and any one is at liberty to relinquish her office at any time. Their duties are to minister to the poor, to visit the sick, pray with the dying, comfort the sorrowing and devote themselves exclusively to the Christian work that lies nearest to hand and is most suited to their different abilities—all working subordinately to a superintendent who in turn is governed by the laws of the church with which the Home is affiliated.

Thus it happens that these Deaconess Homes, in every city where they have been established, have become centres of Christian effort and widespread benevolence, reaching out to the very poor in tenements and the slums, and doing the very work that Jesus commanded us to do; "searching out the highways and by-ways." What we have given is but a fragmentary glimpse of the actual work done in New York alone. What an amount of God's sunshine and cheer to be diffused by a single home!

A Child's Idea of Art.

"OBSERVE a child in a picture gallery," writes George L. Schreiber, "it never wonders how a picture was painted, nor does it admire the clever brushwork; all its impressions resolve themselves into the great question: what does all this mean? What it sees is something that appeals to its consciousness of being and its whole sensitive nature responds at once. The child is here confronted with an array of something which we unwittingly might call 'pretty,' but, which, for it, stands for all there is; and it is wisely silent. But watch this child when it reaches home and leave it to itself, and it remembers that it saw something and forthwith begins to draw, no matter how crudely, what it has recognized as a real thing — and each added stroke adds to its self-consciousness. Or better, give it some clay and it will begin to do, what the most ancient records show us man in his infancy did, and, which put into a museum might hold its place as a primitive work of art. Here we touch upon the child's artistic seeing powers—it is self-consciousness beginning to express itself; this is the beginning of all art."

Dangerous Associations.

MANY young people nowadays are not careful as to associates. If you wish to retain the spirituality of your religion, you should be very careful how you mingle with the world. The company of ungodly men or women, no matter how witty or learned they may be, is a positive peril. It is impossible to associate with such by choice without suffering by the contact. One may be amused or delighted by such people, but will turn, even from the festival of wit, with a lean soul. —D. J. F.

Bright Faces.

ONE of my friends who seems to have gained the secret of perpetual youth and good spirits, writes Miss Kate Sanborn, said to me lately: "Do you notice I always put on my sweetest, most unruffled expression when I'm in a great hurry or get caught in a crowd, a thing I detest, or whenever I want to look worried, because most other women do look so like crazy frights in a crisis?" It is not the great men or women who look the most borne down by responsibility and anxiety. Gladstone has less lines of care than a woman out on a shopping tour on "bargain day."

DON'T CARRY TALES.

TALE-BEARERS almost always deal in superlatives, writes Dr. Talmage. If a man shows a little impatience, they say he was lived with rage. If he were seen drinking soda, they call him a besotted inebriate. They put the blow-pipe of their exaggeration into the slightest inconsistency, and blow till their cheeks are distended, and the bubble swells, and the story is rounded into a great orb in which swim all the rainbows of conceit, and you can see almost anything you want to see. They are hounds, good for nothing but a chase. When you hear evil of any one, suspend judgment. Do not decide till you have heard the man's defence. Do not run out to meet every heated whelp of malice that runs with its head down and its tongue out. The probability is that it is mad, and will only bite those who attempt to entertain it.

Be lenient with the fallen. You see a brother fall, and say, "I never could have done that!" Perhaps you could not, because your temptation does not happen to be in that direction; but you have done things in the course of your life that these fallen men would never have done, because their temptation was not in that direction.

Do not say in boasting, "I never could have done such a thing as that!" You don't know what you would do if sufficiently tempted. You have an infinite soul-force. If grace direct it, a force for the right; if evil influences seize upon it, a terrific force for the wrong There are passions within your soul that have never been unchained. Look out if once they slip their cables!

In our criticism of others let us remember that we have faults which our friends have to excuse. How much would be left of us if all those who see inconsistencies in us should clip away from our character and reputation?

Late Hours.

CHILDREN'S amusements should be such as do not of themselves involve late hours, or tend directly to the premature developing of their young natures. They should not be such as are likely to become permanent occupations rather than temporary amusements; such as gain a stronger and stronger hold with the passing years instead of being outgrown with childhood; or such as open the way to the child's becoming a professional amusement-maker. They should be such as will have a centripetal rather than a centrifugal force, as related to the home circle.

It ought to be so, in every well-ordered home, that a child can find more pleasure at home than away from home; and this state of things will depend very much upon the kind of amusements that are secured in a child's home. It is not enough that there be amusements at the home, but the amusements there must be those that cannot be engaged in elsewhere as well as there. Many a parent makes the mistake of trying to keep his children at home by introducing amusements there that arouse in the children a desire to go elsewhere for some of the same sort in greater freshness or variety.

"Don't God Know?"

T.G., Oswego, N.Y., writes: "Having seen in late issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, two articles, one headed 'Faith of Childhood,' another 'Confidence of Childhood,' I thought I would venture to send you two incidents in the life of my four-year-old daughter, which I put in rhyme:

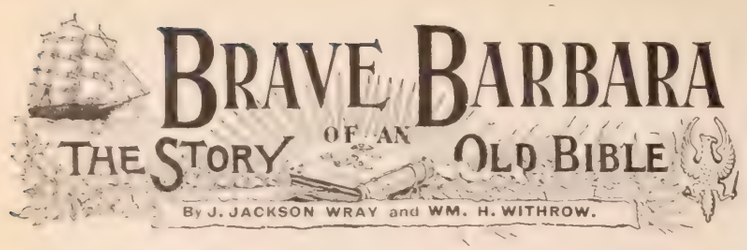
"Don't God know best when to let it rain?"
Asked my child, who a ride expected,
And the rain came down, yet I saw no frown,
And she seemed not the least dejected.

Another day, and the sun's warm ray
Shed o'er earth a breath of summer,
With impatience now she wiped her brow,—
Such heat might well o'ercome her.

But, mark a change on her glowing cheek,
Deep thought her bosom swelling
Like pent-up waters gushing forth
From the depths of the fountain welling,

And "Don't God make the sunshine too?"
She asked in a tone so confiding,
And a bright tear gleamed in her eye of blue,
Like dew 'mong the violets hiding.

"And don't He know when the sun should shine,
And when it should be raining?"
Then again she smiled, a happy child,
And I heard no more complaining.



CHAPTER V.

THE CAPTAIN PREACHER.

"I SEE not how I can interfere," said Captain Lister to the meddlesome customs officer, "further than to counsel you to quietly withdraw;" and, suiting the action to the word, the man of war retreated to the door, as became a man of peace. He was quite clear that the invaders had taken up an untenable position, and, for interested reasons, was bent on playing the part of peace-maker.

The other civilian in the little group of objectors was not so readily to be silenced. His name was Carruthers—a man of wealth and "family" in the island, whose strong points, in his own estimation, were that he was allied to the English nobility, was a landed proprietor, thanks to a Government "grant," obtained in shady fashion by Court favor, was also a senior church-warden in the parish in which "these Methody sectaries had set up their 'preaching shop,'" and a close friend of the clergyman, the Reverend Sydney Pemberton, who had declared his intention to "shut 'em up," to "snuff 'em out," and otherwise "make an end of 'em."

Squire Carruthers was utterly disgusted with the turn that matters were taking. His somewhat highly colored and bibulous cast of countenance which largely explained his exile from the old country, waxed hotter than it was wont to be. In stentorian and indignant tones he proceeded to deliver his soul:

"I must protest, Captain Lester," said he, "against any kind of grace or favor being shown to these contemptible Swaddlers who have come out from the slime of their Irish bogs to crawl over our fair city, and to croak out their damnable heresies—"

"Egsguse me, Herr Carruthers. You haaf said wot is not drue; and if it vos drue, you haaf said it where you haaf no beesness. As a joostice of de beace, I sall be gombelled to order your arrest," said Jan interrupting.

"Oh, no, no!" said Philip Embury, lifting up his hand in deprecation.

"Dat is joost as dese goot beople sall vish," said Jan Stuyvesant, who had arrived in time to hear the churchwarden's flowers of speech. "Den dere is von oder way. Herr Carruthers moost abologise. Eef not, den Gonstable Morris, who makes one of dis brecious band of brawlers, has my orders."

So saying, Jan Stuyvesant stood waiting, clothed with authority as one of the civic "powers that be," stroking his short beard and looking from under his bushy brows in a [illegible] convinced Carruthers that he meant what he said. That gentleman, feeling that discretion was the better part of valor "abologized," and the crest-fallen brawlers silently

Our little band of truly primitive Methodists however, were a good deal scared by what [illegible] might be. Occasionally, they were the sub- [illegible] and the profane; and on more than [illegible] speaking, however, [illegible] but surely leavened with Gospel

AN EASTER LESSON.

VERY early in the morning
Came the Marys to the tomb,
Bearing for their Lord's anointing
Spices rich of rare perfume.
But their hearts were sad and dreary
As they journeyed on their way;
And they asked, in fear, the question,
"Who shall roll the stone away?"

"Who shall roll the stone away?"
Trembling, anxiously they say.
Knowing not that angel fingers
Had the stone then rolled away.

Are we like the Marys, going
On some mission of Christ's love?
Does there rise across our pathway
Something we cannot remove?
Are our hearts, too, heavy laden
As we journey on our way?
Do we ask, like them the question:
"Who shall roll the stone away?"

"Who shall roll the stone away?"
Trembling, wistfully we say,
When perhaps, by hands of angels,
'Tis already rolled away.

THE BIBLE IN INDIA

THE report of the Bible Society at Bangalore, India, for last year shows, among other noteworthy facts, that the circulation of Scriptures in the Bangalore district—the centre of the Kanarese-speaking population—has within the last six years almost doubled. In 1886 it was slightly over 10,000 copies; the return for 1892 is 19,261, and this in spite of a decrease of the number of colporteurs employed. A revision of the Kanarese Bible is going steadily forward, and good progress has been made during the past year. One object kept steadily in view is to produce a version which shall be essentially popular—as easily intelligible as possible to the common people—that is, not only to the Brahman and the scholar, but equally to the children in schools and congregations, and to the illiterate women, ryots and low castes, who hear it at churches and public meetings. In attaining this difficult but important end, the revisers aim at an idiomatic translation—true to Kanarese ways of thought as well as to the original Hebrew and Greek—and speaking to the native mind with the accent and reality of their own familiar tongue. It is hoped that good progress will be made with the more important books of the New Testament in 1893.

A Doubt Removed.

In the mind of every thoughtful and prudent man who insures his life there is often a lingering doubt as to whether his wishes and expectations in regard to the disposition of his insurance will be carried out by his executors, and whether it is possible that those for whom he is providing may by some error in judgment or financial catastrophe be called upon to face the want and poverty from which he is laboring and planning to protect them. The doubt is a natural one, and it has puzzled many wise heads how best to make the proceeds of a policy an absolutely safe, permanent and sure source of income to the recipient. The Mutual Life Insurance Company has solved the problem, and in its last creation, the Five Per Cent. Debenture, a form of insurance is presented which removes all doubt and is as certain as a Government Bond.

EASTER MORN.

JOYOUSLY I greet the dawn
Of this wondrous Easter morn;
Everything with me is singing;
Earth from slumber deep is waking,
And new lease of life is taking,
Trees and flowers, budding, springing—
All are glad.

Blessed Jesus who, for me,
Died on the Cross on Calvary,
Thy redeeming work is done;
O'er the tomb no more I weep,
Thou hast wakened from Death's sleep;
Pain is past, and victory won:
Hearts are glad.

Waiting for that coming day,
When heaven and earth shall pass away,
And we all with Christ shall dwell;
This the joy which Easter brings,
And what wonder nature sings!
Angels echo, "Ye may well
To-day be glad!"

If you look at a dozen common lamp-chimneys, and then at Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass," you will see the differences—all but one—they break from heat; these don't; you can't see that.

Common glass is misty, milky, dusty; you can't see through it; Macbeth's is clear.

Tough, clear glass is worth fine work; and a perfect chimney of fine tough glass is worth a hundred such as you hear, pop, clash on the least provocation.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON
QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION
MODENE
AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

—Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.—

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) AMONG THE SYRIAN DRUSES.

The Swiss of Palestine, who Dwell on the Bleak Heights of Mount Carmel.

PEASANT life in Palestine has many features in common with the same social station in other countries. One thing, however, impresses itself upon the traveler in Syria: he discovers that poverty is not necessarily accompanied by idleness, for industry is the rule rather than the exception among the Syrian poor. Beyond a rare instance in some of the larger cities, there is no such abject destitution to be found as exists among the very poor in some European and American cities. An interesting phase of peasant-life in the East is depicted in the illustration on this page, showing a party of Druses at their repast. They are dwellers in one of the villages far up the side of the ridge of Mount Carmel, and have in all likelihood assembled in some town in the valley below either to discuss matters relating to politics and local administration, to arrange a marriage contract affecting a bride and groom of social importance, or to arbitrate some dispute relating to property. Such a conference would naturally be held in the house of the Sheikh of the tribe, who everything being satisfactorily concluded, would invite all to remain as his guests and sup with him. At the head of the group sits the venerable Sheikh, with the guest of honor on his right, while the others are ranged on cushions spread on the matting of the apartment. Servants enter, bearing huge dishes of food and spoons. The larger dish has, first, a layer of bread, then one of rice and another of meat, all appetizingly cooked. It may be that all the guests have not spoons, and in that contingency the fingers are used to convey the food to the mouth. This is no violation of the proprieties, as everywhere in the East the hands are thoroughly washed both before and after meals.

Although the refinements of the modern cuisine are tolerably well known in the large cities of the East; in the villages and rural districts of Palestine everything that relates to the kitchen is still very primitive. Food is simple and wholesome, and well-cooked and abundant. One substantial dish (usually compounded of bread, rice and stewed meat), followed by coffee, constitutes the entire meal, the repast being practically limited to a single course. Robed in their long abbas or cloaks, beneath which are the kibbirs or lighter undercoat, and with characteristic white linen turbans, the group of Druse peasants makes a not altogether unimposing picture. These men belong in all likelihood to the farming or shepherd class, the most prosperous among the Druses. Carmel is not their native home. There are nearly 80,000 Druses scattered throughout Syria, most of them living among the hills. They are the Swiss of Palestine, and are refugees or the descendants of refugees, who being accused of complicity in the massacre of Lebanon Christians in 1860, fled to escape French retaliation, and chose a retreat in the most lonely and inaccessible parts of the mountain ranges of the Holy Land.

They are a peculiar people. Believing themselves to be descended from Jacob, they are yet neither Jew, Moslem nor Christian. Their religion is a strange mixture of conflicting beliefs. Mohammed Ben Israel Darasi, the founder of the sect, and from whom they derive their name, they call "The Impostor." They mingle Mohammedan with Christian ideas in their devotions and tincture the whole with nature-worship and idolatry. They believe in transmigration. They have no priests and offer no prayers, but have buildings set apart for the purpose of religious meditation, and as depositories for their sacred writings. Their daily lives are moral and virtuous; but the ancient, inherited hatred against the Christians seizes every opportunity for oppression, in districts where the Druses are numerous and influential. Courageous beyond description, they are the finest horsemen in Palestine, excelling even the Bedouins. They are subject to the Moslem laws, but prefer to settle their own disputes, wherever possible, by the patriarchal system of government, which they still preserve. Among them are men who rank as princes and great chiefs. They are represented by leaders of ability in the administration of local affairs, under Turkish supreme jurisdiction, however.

On the topmost plateau of the long ridge of Carmel is the Druse village of Esfia. At that great height, 1700 feet above the sea level, hid among these rocky and sterile wilds, it is invisible from the fertile valleys below. Herds of cattle, sheep, asses and goats belonging to the mountaineers, roam the sides of Carmel, seeking a scanty herbage, although there are many places, far up the hillsides, where the land is rich and where wheat, beans and lentils can be raised in abundance. The Druses are very industrious and thrifty and their little villages blossom like flower-clusters among the mountain ridges, from whose flinty slopes and thin soil they have wrung a degree of prosperity that shames the slower dwellers of the plain beneath. These villages are scattered all over the Lebanon mountains from Samaria toward Damascus, the range being merely a semi-barren ridge with few peaks. The Druse villages consist of flat-roofed houses of stone, one-story high. Only a few hundred feet above their white roofs can be seen the perpetual snows, while, it may be, the crater of some long extinct volcano lies an equal distance below. Half exiles, half hermits, scattered over Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, found also in the Hauran and as far north as Beyrout, this strange sect, whose members have wandered from God, and alienated themselves from their fellowmen, will yet be reconciled and restored to their righteous allegiance in the day when "He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel. (Ps. 147:2.)

DRUSE PEASANTS OF MOUNT CARMEL AT THEIR REPAST.

From a photograph obtained in Palestine by Rev. Dr. Talmage

The Tabernacle Pulpit

MIDNIGHT IN TOWN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Genesis 1 : 5: "And the darkness he called night."

TWO grand divisions of time. The one of sunlight, the other of shadow; the one for work, the other for rest; the one a type of everything glad and beautiful, the other used in all languages as a type of sadness, and affliction, and sin. These two divisions were made by the Lord himself. Other divisions of time may have nomenclature of human invention, but the darkness held up its dusky brow to the Lord and he baptized it, the dew dripping from his fingers as he gave it a name—"and the darkness he called night." My subject is midnight in town. The thunder of the city has rolled out of the air. The slightest sounds cut the night with such distinctness as to attract your attention. The tinkling of the bell of the street car in the distance, and the baying of the dog. The stamp of a horse in the next street. The slamming of a saloon door. The hiccough of the drunkard. The shrieks of the steam-whistle five miles away. Oh! how suggestive, my friends; midnight in town.

There are honest men passing up and down the street. Here is a city missionary who has been carrying a scuttle of coal to that poor family in that dark place. Here is an undertaker going up the steps of a building from which there comes a bitter cry which indicates that the destroying angel has smitten the first-born. Here is a minister of religion who has been giving the sacrament to a dying Christian. Here is a physician passing along in great haste, the messenger a few steps ahead hurrying on to the household. Oh! the midnight in town! What a stupendous thought—a whole city at rest!

Let the city sleep. But, my friends, be not deceived. There will be thousands to-night who will not sleep at all. Go up that dark alley, and be cautious where you tread, lest you fall over the prostrate form of a drunkard lying on his own door-step. Look about you, lest you feel the garroter's hug. Look through the broken window-pane, and see what you can see. You say, "Nothing." Then listen. What is it? "God help us!" No footlights, but tragedy ghastlier and mightier than Ristori or Edwin Booth ever enacted. No light, no fire, no bread, no hope. Shivering in the cold, they have had no food for twenty-four hours. You say, "Why don't they beg?" They do, but they get nothing. You say, "Why don't they deliver themselves over to the almshouse?" Ah! you would not ask that if you ever heard the bitter cry of a man or a child when told he must go to the almshouse.

Pass on through the alley. Open the door. "Oh," you say, "it is locked." No, it is not locked; it has never been locked. No burglar would be tempted to go in there to steal anything. The door is never locked. Only a broken chair stands against the door. Shove it back. Go in. Strike a match. Now, look. Beastliness and rags. See those glaring eyeballs. Be careful now what you say. Do not utter any insult, do not utter any suspicion, if you value your life. What is that red mark on the wall? It is the mark of a murderer's hand! Look at those two eyes rising up out of the darkness and out from the straw in the corner, coming toward you, and as they come near you, your light goes out. Strike another match. Ah! this is a babe, not like the beautiful children of your household, or the beautiful children smiling around these altars on baptismal day. This little one never smiled; it never will smile. A flower flung on an awfully barren beach. Oh! Heavenly Shepherd, fold that little one in thy arms. Wrap around you your shawl or your coat tighter, for the cold night wind sweeps through.

THE CITY MISSIONARY AND THE HOMELESS ONE.

Strike another match. Ah! is it possible that that young woman's scarred and bruised face was ever looked into by maternal tenderness? Utter no scorn. Utter no harsh word. No ray of hope has dawned on that brow for many a year. No ray of hope ever will dawn on that brow. But the light has gone out. Do not strike another light. It would be a mockery to kindle another light in such a place as that. Pass out and pass down the street. Our cities of Brooklyn and New York and all our great cities are full of such homes, and the worst time the midnight.

Do you know it is in the midnight that criminals do their worst work?

At half-past eight o'clock you will find them in the drinking-saloon, but toward twelve o'clock they go to their garrets, they get out their tools, then they start on the street. Watching on either side for the police, they go to their work of darkness. This is a burglar, and the false key will soon touch the store lock. This is an incendiary, and before morning there will be a light on the sky, and cry of "Fire! fire!" This is an assassin, and to-morrow morning there will be a dead body in one of the vacant lots. During the daytime these villains in our cities lounge about, some asleep and some awake, but when the third watch of the night arrives, their eye keen, their brain cool, their arm strong, their foot fleet to fly or pursue, they are ready.

In the midnight, gambling does its worst work. What though the hours be slipping away, and though the wife be waiting in the cheerless home? Stir up the fire. Bring on more drinks. Put up more stakes. That commercial house that only a little while ago put out sign of copartnership will this season be wrecked on a gamblers' table. There will be many a money-till that will spring a leak.

In the midnight hour, pass down the streets of our American cities, and you hear the click of the dice and the sharp, keen tap of the pool-room ticker. In one year, in the city of New York, there were seven million dollars sacrificed at the gaming-table. Perhaps some of your friends have been smitten of this sin. Perhaps some of you have been smitten by it. Perhaps there may be a stranger in the house this morning come from some of the hotels. Look out for those agents of iniquity who tarry around about the hotels, and ask you, "Would you like to see the city?" Yes. "Have you ever seen that splendid building uptown?" No. Then the villain will undertake to show you what he calls the "lions" and the "elephants," and after a young man, through morbid curiosity or through badness of soul, has seen the "lions" and the "elephants," he will be on enchanted ground. Look out for these men who move around the hotels with sleek hats—always sleek hats—and patronizing air, and unaccountable interest about your welfare and entertainment. You are a fool if you cannot see through it. They want your money. In Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, while I was livin that city, an incident occurred which was familiar to us there. In Chestnut Street a young man went into a gambling saloon, lost all his property, then blew his brains out, and before the blood was washed from the floor by the maid, the comrades were shuffling cards again. You see there is more mercy in the highwayman for the belated traveler on whose body he heaps the stones, there is more mercy in the frost for the flower that it kills, there is more mercy in the hurricane that shivers the steamer on the Long Island coast, than there is mercy in the heart of a gambler for his victim.

In the midnight hour, also, drunkenness does its worst. The drinking will be respectable at eight o'clock in the evening, a little flushed at nine, talkative and garrulous at ten, at eleven blasphemous, at twelve the hat falls off and the man falls to the floor asking for more drink. Strewn through the drinking-saloons of the city, fathers, brothers, husbands, sons, as good as you are by nature, perhaps better. In the midnight meetings a great multitude have been saved. We want a few hundred Christian men and women to come down from the highest circles of society to toil amid these wandering and destitute ones, and kindle up a light in the dark alley, even the gladness of heaven,

Do not go from your well-filled tables with the idea that pious talk is going to stop the gnawing of an empty stomach or to warm stockingless feet. Take bread, take raiment, take medicine as well as take prayer. There is a great deal of common sense in what the poor woman said to the city missionary when he was telling her how she ought to love God and serve him. "Oh!" said she, "if you were as poor and cold as I am, and as hungry, you could think of nothing else."

A great deal of what is called Christian work goes for nothing for the simple reason it is not practical; as after the battle of Antietam a man got out of an ambulance with a bag of tracts, and he went distributing the tracts, and George Stuart, one of the best Christian men in this country, said to him, "What are you distributing tracts for now? There are three thousand men bleeding to death. Bind up their wounds, and then distribute the tracts."

Are there in this assemblage this morning those who know by experience the tragedies of midnight in town? I am not here to thrust you back with one hard word. Take the bandage from your bruised soul, and put on it the soothing salve of Christ's Gospel and of God's compassion. I could give you the history, in a minute, of one of the best friends I ever had. Outside of my own family, I never had a better friend. He welcomed me to my home at the West. He was of splendid personal appearance, and he had an ardor of soul and a warmth of affection that made me love him like a brother. I saw men coming out of the saloons and gambling-hells, and they surrounded my friend, and they took him at the weak point, his social nature, and I saw him going down, and I had a fair talk with him—for I never yet saw a man you could not talk with on the subject of his habits, if you talked with him in the right way. I said to him, "Why don't you give up your bad habits and become a Christian?" I remember now just how he looked, leaning over his counter, as he replied: "I wish I could. Oh! sir, I should like to be a Christian, but I have gone so far astray I can't get back."

So the time went on. After awhile the day of sickness came. I was summoned to his sickbed. I hastened. It took me but a very few moments to get there. I was surprised as I went in. I saw him in his ordinary clothes, fully dressed, lying on the top of the bed. I gave him my hand, and he seized it convulsively, and said: "Oh! how glad I am to see you. Sit down there." I sat down, and he said: "Mr. Talmage, just where you sit now my mother sat last night. She has been dead twenty years. Now, I don't want you to think I am out of my mind, or that I am superstitious; but, sir, she sat there last night just as certainly as you sit there now—the same cap, and apron, and spectacles. It was my old mother—she sat there." Then he turned to his wife, and said, "I wish you would take these strings off the bed; somebody is wrapping strings around me all the time. I wish you would stop that annoyance.' She said, "There is nothing here." Then I saw it was delirium.

Arrangements were made for the obsequies. The question was raised whether they should bring him to church. Somebody said, "You can't bring such a dissolute man as that into the church." I said, "You will bring him in the church; he stood by me when he was alive, and I will stand by him when he is dead. Bring him." As I stood in the pulpit, and saw them carrying the body up the aisle, I felt as if I could weep tears of blood.

On one side of the pulpit sat his little child of eight years, a sweet, beautiful little girl that I had seen him hug convulsively in his better moments. He put on her all jewels, all diamonds, and gave her all pictures and toys, and then he would go away as if hounded by an evil spirit, to his cups and house of shame a fool to the correction of the stocks. She looked up wonderingly. She knew not what it all meant. She was not old enough to understand the sorrow of an orphan child.

On the other side the pulpit sat the men who had ruined him; they were the men who had poured wormwood into the orphan's cup; they were the men who had bound him hand and foot. I knew them. How did they seem to feel? Did they weep? No. Did they say, "What a pity that such a generous man should be destroyed?" No. Did they sigh repentantly over what they had done?" No; they sat there, looking as vultures look at the carcass of the lamb whose heart they have ripped out. So they sat and looked at the coffin-lid, and I told them the judgment of God upon those who had destroyed their fellows. Did they reform? I was told they were in the places of iniquity that night after my friend was laid in Oakwood Cemetery, and they blasphemed, and they drank. Oh! how merciless men are especially after they have destroyed you! Do not look to men for comfort or help. Look to God.

But there is a man who will not reform. He says, "I won't reform." Well, then, how many acts are there to a tragedy. I believe five.

Act the first of the tragedy. A young man starting off from home; parents and sisters weeping to have him go. Wagon rising over the hill. Farewell kiss flung back. Ring the bell and let the curtain fall.

Act the second. The marriage altar. Full organ. Bright lights. Long white veil trailing through the aisle. Prayer and congratulation, and exclamation of "How well she looks!"

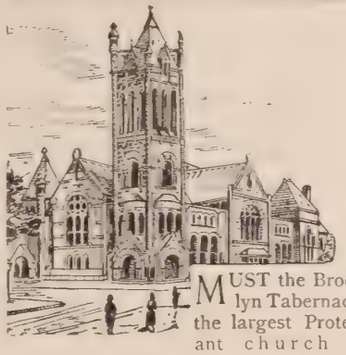
Act the third. A woman waiting for staggering steps. Old garments stuck into the broken window-pane. Marks of hardship on the face. The biting of the nails of bloodless fingers. Neglect, and cruelty, and despair. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act the fourth. Three graves in a dark place—grave of the child that died for lack of medicine, grave of the wife that died of a broken heart, grave of the man that died of dissipation. Oh! what a blasting heath of three graves. Plenty of weeds, but no flowers. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act the fifth: A destroyed soul's eternity. No light. No music. No hope. Anguish coiling its serpents around the heart. Blackness of darkness forever. But I cannot look any longer. Woe! woe! I close my eyes to this last act of the tragedy. Quick! Quick! Ring the bell and let the curtain drop. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart rejoice in the days of thy youth; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." "There is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the end thereof is death."

To Save the Tabernacle!

Generous Responses from Many Quarters to Rev. Dr. Talmage's Appeal—Warm Letters of Sympathy—The Fund is now Nearly $13,000.



MUST the Brooklyn Tabernacle, the largest Protestant church in America, and the scene of the labors of the greatest modern preacher, go under the hammer, or shall it be saved to Christianity? This is the startling question submitted by Rev. Dr. Talmage to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the personal appeal we published from his pen in our last issue. It was probably the most striking document ever written by one whose writings, sermonic and otherwise, have enthralled millions of readers all over the world. In presenting that appeal, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD confidently believes that it is affording the great army of spiritually-minded and self-sacrificing men and women, whom it delights to count as its friends, a privilege they will not be slow to accept.

Beyond the merest reference, Dr. Talmage has said nothing of his own sacrifices to help the Tabernacle. There is a widespread impression that he is in receipt of a princely income from his church, whereas the actual fact is, that he has given his services practically free for three years—a thing unheard of in metropolitan pastorates. While his congregation was worshipping in the Academy of Music, during the erection of the present Tabernacle, he neither asked nor accepted any compensation whatsoever. After the opening of the Tabernacle, for the first year he donated his services publicly. Thus far, on the second year, he has received in addition to the repayment of the $6000 which he advanced to make the continuation of the work possible, only the paltry sum of $625, leaving a balance due him of $10,000. As was seen from his personal appeal published in these columns, in addition to foregoing this claim, he forwarded his check for $10,000 to the Emergency Fund, making his total gift to the Tabernacle at the present time Twenty thousand dollars. So much for the self-sacrifice of a pastor who, after having devoted a lifetime to helping others, and after building three Tabernacles in succession (two of which were consumed by fire), now finds that unless his own efforts and those of his immediate flock are supplemented by the vast congregation to whom he speaks weekly through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the third Tabernacle, too, must soon become a thing of the past. From its pulpit Dr. Talmage has spoken to all Christendom, for his inspired sermons have been translated into a multitude of tongues and are read by twenty-five million people weekly throughout the year. Never was there a grander agent for spreading the religion of Christ than the Brooklyn Tabernacle. In twenty years it has seated nearly five million strangers, or an average of 250,000 a year. It has raised in a single year for religious purposes, $94,000.

We believe there are thousands among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and their friends and acquaintances, who find spiritual inspiration and encouragement in its pages, who would gladly contribute their mite to save the Tabernacle. To them Dr. Talmage's appeal now comes, and we need hardly explain that the need is urgent. Every contribution of one dollar and upward will be personally acknowledged by Dr. Talmage over his own signature.

From the numerous letters received during the week we can only find space for one or two brief extracts:

Mr. and Mrs. Valentine Young, Bloomsbury, N. J., write:

We see that your spiritual home is greatly encumbered, and is likely, if not released, to become the property of others. This would be sad to us and much sadder to yourself who have labored so long and so faithfully for the Master. Please accept this small token of our regard—our mite to relieve you in this the hour of need.

Hattie J Aldworth, Allegan, Mich., writes:

If each subscriber to your worthy paper would contribute $1, it would quickly raise the Fund. I herewith send express money order from another and myself.

Mrs. Annie M. Hill, Durham, N. Y., writes;

I wish every reader or subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would contribute a dollar. Your financial embarrassment would soon be wiped out.

Job's Confession and Restoration.

S. S. Lesson for April 23. Job. 42: 1-10. Golden Text, James 5: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

JOB'S arguments against God and man were exhausted, he had come to an end of himself. He had neither convinced his friends, nor had he succeeded in regaining his lost communion with God. At last he gave in and said, "the words of Job are ended." Apparently his spirit was still the same; hurt, wounded, feeling himself badly used; as who would not under such trials as his without a distinct manifestation of God? And yet, the very fact of his silence made it possible for God to speak without coming down to the level of Job's fretful, contentious spirit. Job could listen, God could speak. Job knew the voice of God, but the Lord must first approach him through a fellow creature. That the patriarch might take the place of subjection which befitted him, he must know that he was not the only man living who was near to God, and there was a man from whom even the "perfect upright man" could learn.

Thus God sent him Elihu. This man had learned the lesson which Job needed so much to know, Patience With Man.

His own patience with God in all his dispensation had been unimpeachable, but he had not learned to recognize God's permission in that which man said and did. Elihu was a young man; to whom God gave wisdom beyond his years. He saw the point of the situation. Job "had justified himself rather than God," and his friends had found no answer and yet had condemned Job; and seeing all this Elihu yet "waited," "listened," "attended"; but found that there was none to convince Job, he had learned the great lesson: "God may vanquish him, not man." This is the position of power which is unassailable. As soon as man learns to retire from the scene, and leave God to act, something can be done. Now that Elihu had found Job's place as a mere instrument, God laid hold of him, the Spirit within him constrained him, and he ceased to "respect any man's person," for he was in the presence of a higher than man.

Thus sent of God, equipped by God, disciplined by God, the young Elihu might be made a teacher even to the man of whom God had said there was "none like him in the earth!" He had a ministry to Job's friends also, but first to Job for, in God's eyes, Job was none the less precious because he had totally failed under these new tests. Coming directly from God, Elihu knew exactly how to approach the exasperated patriarch; he took up his own words about a "daysman." (9: 32, 33.) "I am, according to thy wish, in God's stead. I also am formed out of the clay." Having thus secured Job's attention, he at once goes to the point of issue between his God and him: "I have heard the voice of thy words, saying: "I am clean, without transgression. I am innocent, neither is there iniquity in me. Behold he [i. e. God] findeth occasions against me. He counteth me for his enemy." Elihu does not take up the merits of the case in themselves, but only refers to the parties involved: "God is greater than man," a creature cannot call his Creator to account, and at once Job is convicted of the sin of condemning God. Then he explains what, till now, had been so inexplicable to Job. God has two voices with which to speak to man: one a gentle voice, in "a dream, in a vision of the night; another, and sterner voice: by "pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain, so that his life abhorreth bread and his soul dainty meat. His flesh is consumed away that it cannot be seen and his bones that were not seen stick out" (33: 14, 19-22); in fact his second voice is sickness. Elihu shews why God thus speaks: "He openeth the ears of men and sealeth their instruction, that he may withdraw man from his purpose and hide pride from man." It had never dawned upon Job that God could find any fault with the purpose, the whole tenor of his life. His conscience did not condemn him of any sin as far as his conception of sin went, but then he was very proud of his integrity and freedom from sin. In his eyes, it was an honest and justifiable pride. It was life to him, it was that which had sustained him through all his reverses that he was such a true and faithful servant of Jehovah. If he might not indulge his pride in this unimpeachable integrity, what was there left him? He was unutterably undone. And yet, in this very "purpose" of maintaining his own integrity, in the very "pride" which seemed to him so justifiable, Job actually sat in judgment upon his God as though he were God's superior!

The tried, crushed Job was too honest to repel the conviction that he had found a man who could explain God's dealing with him. Sick he was indeed, his whole body full of sores, and while he had imagined that God had steeled himself against his prayer, he was himself deaf to the very voice he longed to hear, because it spoke in this unusual way. "If there be a messenger," continued Elihu, "an interpreter, one among a thousand, to shew unto man what is right for him (R.V.) then he is gracious unto him, and saith: Deliver him from going down into the pit,

I have found a Ransom."

What was this? Did Job's integrity go for nothing, and did God's Ransom do more for him than his own recommendation of himself to God? This was new light to Job. And when Elihu said that healing would follow: "His flesh shall be fresher than a child's, he shall return unto the days of his youth," and renewed communion: "He shall pray unto God, and he will be favorable unto him," light from heaven, revealing the sin of his own heart, and God's way of return, began to pour in upon his soul; he saw that reconciliation must begin on God's side. Elihu next addressed Job's friends on the same line, and shewed them in his presence, that his sin had not been such as they had so heartlessly and groundlessly supposed, but he "multiplied his words against God" and "multiplieth his words without knowledge." He then takes up point after point of Job's accusations of God, and refutes them; and then points to his wondrous government in nature, so attracting the eye of Job from himself and from his friends.

When the eye is off self, it is wonderful how soon the self wounds heal up. Job was now in a condition to listen to God. And he who had been watching with intense love all the time his child had been in the furnace, now speaks to him in another voice than sickness; but it is out of the whirlwind not yet the quiet still communion with which he lets his children walk with him. He endorses what Elihu has said about Job's sin of "words:" Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? "Job had said: O that I knew where I might find him, that I might come even to his seat, I would order my cause before him I would fill my mouth with arguments." Now God speaks to him unfolding his laws and purposes in nature, and shewing Job both his ignorance and his littleness until at last he appeals: "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? he that reproveth God, let him answer it." But Job's arguments had vanished: "Behold I am vile," is his reply: "what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth. Once have I spoken; but I will not answer; yea, twice, but I will proceed no further."

Job was Conquered;

but God would bring him lower still. He must know, as God sees it, the depth of his sins: "Wilt thou condemn me that thou mayest be righteous? Hast thou an arm like God? Or canst thou thunder with a voice like him. Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency, thou who art loathsome with thy sores and array thyself with glory and beauty. . . Then will I confess unto thee that thine own right hand can save thee." And again the Lord appeals to his works in nature, all of which are subject to their Creator, all of which carry out his purpose. It was enough, Job was thoroughly subdued and emptied, he could answer now, but not order his cause, he could only bow to his Superior: I know that thou canst do everything, and that no thought can be withholden from thee. Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? Therefore I have uttered that I understand not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not. Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me. I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes. My heart shall not reproach me as long as I live, he had said, but now he was dead, slain by the Word of the Lord.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE final triumph and vindication of Job are the subject of the lesson. To learn how the author of the book works out the result, the intervening chapters should be briefly summarized. At the place of last week's lesson, each of the three friends had made a speech and Job had replied. Another series of speeches from the friends and replies from Job follow. The friends are more personal and bitter in their second speeches. They are represented as grieved that Job should persist in denying that he was guilty of heinous sin, when, according to their theory, the fact of his being so terribly afflicted was positive proof of his guilt. But still Job refuses to confess. Then they become angry with him and reprove him sharply in a third series of speeches. No mention of Zophar is made in this third series, but he evidently was not silent. His third speech begins at the eleventh verse of the twenty-seventh chapter and extends to the twenty-third verse. That speech looks, in our version, as if it were a part of Job's reply to Bildad; but when it is read carefully it is clear that it is not Job who is speaking, as the passage traverses Job's argument. The style and the matter are Zophar's as will be seen by comparing the speech with his two former speeches. It is evident that through an inadvertence, some ancient copyist has dropped the usual introductory words, "Then answer Zophar the Naamathite and said." Job again replies and shows that he is still unconvinced. He is still confident that if he could come face to face with God he would be able to prove his innocence. But when God speaks the man quails. His mouth is not full of arguments as he said it would be. He is appalled and overwhelmed and abhors himself. Then God declares himself satisfied. Job has been brought to the state in which he declares that though he cannot understand God he trusts him and acquiesces in his will. The story is complete. Satan had contended that Job served God because God prospered him. Events have proved that even if Job must serve God for naught, he would still serve him.

I uttered that which I understood not. We do not know God's purpose in our trials and disappointments. God sometimes brings out of them a better good than could have been produced by ease and comfort. When John Bunyan was shut up in prison he probably thought it a mysterious providence. He would wonder that God did not protect him. He was so busy preaching and teaching that it seemed sad to have the good work stopped. But we understand it now. John Bunyan could never have done so much good by his preaching as he did by writing the Pilgrim's Progress in prison. A few might have profited by his preaching, but hundreds of thousands have profited by the work he did in prison and which he would never have done if he had not been shut up there. Sir Humphrey Davy, the great chemist, said that his failures had led him to his most remarkable discoveries. And so God often allows persons to fail and to come to an end of their own ability before he makes his strength perfect in their weakness. Fire on the farm of George Thurman, five miles north of Pomona, California, brought him singular good fortune. To stop the progress of the fiery monster which was fast devouring his stubble-field, he ploughed a furrow, and in doing so he turned up a tin can, which would hold about half a gallon. He found, upon opening it, a large quantity of gold, both coin and nuggets. The value of the find was 7,000 and it was gained through a calamity. So when we fret and repine under trouble we show a want of faith. The trouble may have come to bring out of us some result of special value. Therefore when in our hearts we blame God for the trouble and plead with him to take it away, we, like Job, "utter that which we understand not."

I heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee, I abhor myself. So long as Job's friends talked to him and spoke about God, Job maintained his confidence in himself. He felt that he was as good as they. But when God revealed himself, Job lost his self-respect. Compared with the omnipotent, the all-wise, pure and holy Being, he seemed to himself a poor, miserable creature. He abhorred himself. Every one is liable to become a Pharisee while his eye is fixed on other people, but he soon has a different opinion of himself when he studies God's character. He judges then by a higher standard. Henry Ward Beecher said: "One day when I was with Mr. Hicks, the painter, I saw on his table some high-colored stones, and I asked him what they were for. He said they were to keep his eye up to tone. When he was working in pigments, insensibly his sense of color was weakened, and by having a pure color near him he brought it up again, just as the musician, by his test fork, brings himself up to the right pitch. Now every day men need to have a sense of the invisible God. A clear conception of the perfect One produces a moral impression."

Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right. Not only by our speech, but by our actions, we may misrepresent God. People who do not read the Bible and do not pray to God, do not know anything about him. The only way that they form any idea of him is by the lives of his people. If Christian people are gloomy, and morose, and ill-tempered, and selfish, the people who do not know God think that he is the same kind of Being, and so they do not love him as they might, if they had a different idea of him. A poor girl, partially intoxicated, was brought to the door of a Christian woman in Chicago. The latter was a poor woman, yet she took the wanderer in, and cared for her as best she could. The girl said she had no home or friends, and that she could no longer endure the life she was then leading. Looking in the woman's face as she ministered to her, she said, "I don't know anything about God, I can't love him; but I do love you." "But," said the good woman, "I am naturally bad. The only reason why I am different from you is that God has put his Spirit in me." The girl looked at her wonderingly, and then said, "I don't understand it, but if God has made the difference he must be very good." And afterward she came to know that what she loved in the good woman was the part of her nature that was God-like, and then she sought the same Spirit for herself.

And the Lord turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends. These men had added to Job's afflictions by their unjust suspicions. His losses and bereavements and bodily suffering had been a heavy burden alone, and his friends had made it heavier. He had been vindicated and the natural man would have felt justified in scorning and upbraiding them. But he prays for them. This was the highest step in Job's development. He proved himself magnanimous. The author of the book makes a significant connection in telling this part of the story. Job's captivity was turned when he prayed for them. That is, the long dreary road of subjection to repeated strokes of trial ended and he turned to the new road of prosperity. It was a forecast of the prayer we now offer in the fuller light of the Gospel, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive." The turning point was the point where he forgave and prayed for his tormentors. A missionary in India reached in the same way a point where failure turned to success. He was preaching to a crowd of idol-loving Hindoos. He was suddenly interrupted by a native who went behind the desk, intending to knock him down with his stick. The blow, however, fell on the minister's shoulder and did not inflict a serious injury. The congregation were very angry at the offender, and seized him while attempting to escape. "What shall I do with him?" said the missionary. "Give him a good beating," answered some. "Send him to the judge," cried others. "No," said the missionary, "I will forgive him for Christ's sake." The effect of this scene on the Hindoos was most impressive; unable to keep silence, they sprang to their feet and shouted, "Victory to Jesus Christ!"

GEMS FROM THE MIRE.

How the Fallen Girls of New York's Slums are Being Sought and Rescued by two Devoted Christian Ladies.

THREE instances are recorded in the Gospels, of Jesus coming in contact with women of depraved character and in each case his words were kind, pitiful and gentle. He did not shrink away, as if fearing pollution, nor did he show any of the scorn with which such women are usually treated. The church has been slow to follow her Master's example. She has dealt very severely with women who have lost their purity, however leniently she might treat the men who were partners in their sin. The women must become outcasts, when their character was known and when the Gospel was preached to outcasts, the invitation was seldom wide enough to cover this class of sinners. In the increasing light of this century, as the Church has been advancing out of the barren lands in which she lived on the husks of theory and theological quibbles, and has struggled to possess the spirit of Christ, a change has come also in this matter of the fallen. Efforts have been made to reclaim and restore the lost and to open the path to a new and better life. Then the discovery was made that, in a large number of cases, the women did not continue in their sin through perversity, or because they were callous, but because they thought the gates were barred against their return. That discovery involved a duty. It was imperative that the offer of mercy should be carried to the hopeless ones and the assurance given them that full forgiveness awaited any who would forsake their evil way and turn to God. Many consecrated men and women have engaged in this work and scarcely any other field has yielded so rich a harvest.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has described several such efforts, such as the Florence Missions in New York and San Jose, the Margaret Strachan Home and the Door of Hope. There is, however, another work which is little known and which deserves notice, if only as a suggestion to sympathetic Christians in other cities. It bears the same relation to the Missions as the field corps of the hospital service, in war time, bears to the hospitals. As the wounded on the field often need prompt attention and are often unable to reach the hospitals, so there are many of these women, who are too much crushed and maimed in the battle of their lives to make their way to the Missions, where Christian people are waiting "to bind up the broken-hearted."

The origin of the work is very interesting. One Saturday night last summer, a number of Christian young men and women started on an expedition through one of the most depraved districts of New York. Some of them came from Rev. A. B. Simpson's college, where they were being trained for work in heathen lands. They are now scattered through Africa and China, but they see there no lower depth of heathenism than they saw in New York between sunset on that Saturday night and dawn on Sunday morning. The scene of their exploration was the district of which Mulberry Bend is the centre. Dirt and squalor were to be seen on every hand, and vice in all its forms flourished unrestrained. Low-class saloons and opium dens and cheap gambling resorts were doing a thriving trade and the victims with haggard faces and wild eyes, flaming with intoxication, crowded the narrow sidewalks.

The visitors received scant attention; some listened to them in incredulous astonishment, some ridiculed them and others were too much stupefied with opium or liquor to understand what was said to them. About two hours after midnight, a wild, bare-headed woman emerged from some miserable tenement and hurried along Worth Street on a quest for whiskey. She was then under its influence, as she had been for three weeks past; but she had arrived at the stage when she craved more of the stimulant to settle her quivering nerves; so she left her bed and went out only half dressed to get it. A kind word from one of the visitors arrested her steps and she waited long enough to give a mocking answer. But she was not one who had always been such as she then was. Her memory responded to the appeal that was made to her and it called up a picture of happy and pure life which she had known. She broke down in a fit of weeping and ultimately yielded to the invitation to go to a refuge in the upper part of the town. But she insisted that she must have the whiskey first. She would die on the way without it. Her new friends pleaded with and coaxed her as they would a fretful child and eventually induced her to take a glass of soda instead. It was a painful experience taking her up to the home which the Salvation Army has opened in 123rd Street. Her conduct on the elevated railroad was immodest and her speech profane, but at last the destination was reached and she was received. She remained there under Christian influence, was converted, and is now a respected and respectable member of society, earning an honest livelihood, and suggesting, neither by word nor manner, the slough from which she was rescued.

These nocturnal expeditions have been continued and many such trophies have been won. Many of the workers, have, however, been called to other fields and others have been physically unable to bear the strain of the effort. Among the band on that July night was one who has never faltered in the work. Miss Louise Beiser seemed to see in that night's work a special call to her for service. She had already done much Christian work in the slums, supporting herself on her own means and the product of her labor and giving her Christian labor freely to the Lord, for the love of him. She soon became a familiar figure in Mulberry Street and the neighborhood; and many of the degraded people there gave her their respect and confidence. One after another she wooed away from the fascination of vice and carried away to be cared for and taught by Christian people in some mission where there might be room. In some cases they were young girls of seventeen and under, just beginning a life of sin, who occasionally could be restored to their families; others had drunk the cup of sin and misery to the dregs. Some had been well educated and came from Christian homes; other had grown up in practical heathenism; but in all, there was the material for the Holy Spirit to use for the transformation of the whole being into a new creature in Christ Jesus.

Early in Miss Beiser's work, she secured a helper of the most efficient kind in Miss Jessie De Vie, who had herself been rescued from a life of sin and shame through God's blessing on the efforts of the friends at the Florence Mission. It would serve no useful purpose to lift the veil which Jessie gladly draws over the early years of her life. She had sunk very low when she was rescued, was a slave to the opium habit; and had a host of wealthy friends who assailed her with offers of money and luxuries if she would return to the vicious circles over which she had reigned as a queen. The first few weeks of her new life were a horrible ordeal. It seemed as if the temptations with which she was plied, the force of habit, and the craving for luxuries to which she had been accustomed, would draw her back into the Malstrom from which she had barely escaped. But the power of Christ overcame and gradually she was completely delivered. Then there came to her that longing, which every rescued soul feels, to rescue others. She knew by painful experience the characteristics of a vicious life and she could tell the victims, as no other could, how Christ delivers those who trust in him. She acted as Miss Beiser's guide and led her to many concealed haunts, where one and another of Jessie's old acquaintances were found and rescued.

As the work extended, the need of some temporary refuge in the slums made itself felt. Sometimes, after a girl had been with difficulty induced to accept the invitation to enter a home, she would change her mind during the hours that must elapse on the journey. Or, when they reached their destination, they would find that the home was already crowded and their charge could not be received. Sometimes the woman was partially intoxicated and could not be taken on the Elevated Railroad and in any case much valuable time in the night hours was lost in traveling. Miss Beiser and Jessie had many consultations on the subject, and finally they hired with their own scanty resources two rooms in a tenement house, at the rear of 76 Mulberry Street. To these they could take any girl who, tired and worn and weary, felt the promptings to a better life. There she might rest and sleep, and the next day, washed and tidied and calm she might go to the Mission that could receive her.

SCENE IN FRONT OF THE NEW RESCUE MISSION, MULBERRY STREET, NEW YORK.

The poor, dreary, dingy rooms were tenanted every night, and the grimy walls have echoed to many a pleading cry for pardon and strength, and to many an earnest appeal from the servants of Christ to the lost and erring to turn from their wickedness and live. Two other rooms on the same floor were rented as the need grew. The rent absorbed their scanty means, and left nothing available for furniture. But the women who were brought there were concerned about more serious matters than that, and were glad to accept the mattresses on the floor, which was the best accommodation their loving hostesses could afford to offer. Things are a little better now, though few of our readers would like to sleep in such a place. The writer was in the rooms a few days ago, and was glad to see some half dozen cheap but clean, comfortable cots there. Two of them had been gratefully labeled THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cots, as they were the gift of Mr. Klopsch; another bore the name of Mr. Spicer of the Sunday School Union, and another the familiar initials I. H. N., showing that some King's Daughter had provided it. Jessie said that ten women had slept in the rooms the night previous, and as many more would have come if there had been room. The guests had been very grateful, and their hostesses were thankful for the privilege of receiving them. "It is sad to think," Jessie observed, "that we cannot receive all who come, but the place is so small. The rent of these four rooms is $17 a month, There is a convenient house on the next block that would exactly suit us, with eight large, light rooms. If we could get that, then we should be able to do a great work." But the rent is $110 a month, and how could we ever get so much money together? If some of the fathers and mothers who have daughters, and realize what it means to save a girl from sin and shame, knew of our work and how much we could do with a little money, I think they would help us, and then we could have that house. I have set my heart upon it, and I believe the Lord will send us the money yet." Jessie's faith is very beautiful, and those who know how God provides the means for those who are intent on serving him, will not think that it is misplaced.

A Gift to Humanity.

Dr. Joseph Gardner Dedicates a Tract of Land in Indiana to the Red Cross.

DR. JOSEPH GARDNER of Bedford, Ind., has presented to the American National Red Cross, as "the almoner of humanity," a valuable tract of land in the state of Indiana, for the purposes of a home headquarters for the organization. The gift is a princely one, consisting of 782 acres, or something over a square mile in extent. There is a village upon the land with post-office, barns, tenant-houses, orchards, forest, maple groves, oolitic stone quarries, excellent water springs and a river frontage of one mile. A trunk line of railway passes through it and there are three other lines of railway near. It is three hours from Louisville, four from Cincinnati, four from Indianapolis, six from St. Louis, and seven from Chicago. Miss Clara Barton, President of the American National Red Cross, has accepted the gift in behalf of the organization. In her letter to Dr. Gardner she says:

This and will be the one piece of neutral ground on the western hemisphere, protected by international treaty against the tread of hostile feet. It is a perpetual sanctuary against invading armies, and will be so respected and held sacred by the military powers of the world. Forty nations are pledged to hold all material and stores of the Red Cross, and all its followers, neutral in war, and free to go or come as their duties require. While its business headquarters will remain, as before, at the Capital of the Nation, this gift still forms a realization of the hope so long cherished—that the National Red Cross may have a place to accumulate and produce material and stores for sudden emergencies and great calamities; and if war should come upon our land, which may God avert, we may be ready to fulfil the mission that our adhesion to the Geneva Treaty has made binding upon us.

The new property will be known as "Red Cross Park," and for the present will be under the advisory care of Dr. Gardner, who has appointed Mr. J. H. Morlan as his assistant and Park manager. Improvements are already going on, grain is being sowed, and stables erected, and already offers of fine stock are being made from some of the leading stock men of the country. This new acquisition will be of inestimable value to the Red Cross, enabling it to be more than ever prompt and serviceable in the succoring of sufferers by war, flood, famine or pestilence and in the broad field of humanitarianism everywhere.

A CHRISTIAN HOSPITAL IN DAMASCUS

AN effort is being made to secure the funds for building a Christian Hospital at Damascus. Dr. Mackinnon, who has been laboring as a medical missionary in that city, pleads earnestly for the help, and draws a pathetic picture of the need of the people. Many worthy Christian people in London are interested in the movement, so that there is little doubt of its success. The ancient city of Damascus has a population of nearly 200,000 inhabitants, the greatest majority of whom are fanatically opposed to Christianity; it is without hospitals, dispensaries, poor-houses, asylums, or the other expressions of Christian brotherhood. Dr. Mackinnon's work is the only sign the people have that Christianity is a religion of love and kindness. He urgently needs a medical missionary colleague. The first missionaries of the Cross were sent out "two and two," and the wisdom of this Divine arrangement is obvious in efficiently carrying on medical missionary operations; in carrying on the ordinary work of the dispensary or hospital, and, at the same time, outside visitation; in itinerary work; in time of sickness or furlough—the presence of a brother medical missionary must prove an incalculable blessing.

With the establishment of an hospital the aid of a fully-qualified nurse also becomes indispensable. To carry out the scheme—the purchase of land and the erection of a hospital, with accommodation for some sixty patients, dwelling-house, dispensary, etc.—about $25,000 will be required, of which a large part is already subscribed.

SCIENTIFIC CHRISTIANS.

WE are too willing to give up our weapons to the enemy. The world boasts that it has gobbled up the schools, and the colleges, and the arts, and the sciences, and the literature, and the printing press. Infidelity is making a mighty attempt to get all our weapons in its hand, and then to keep them. It is making this boast all the time; and after a while, when the great battle between sin and righteousness has opened, if we do not look out we will be as badly off as the Israelites once were without swords to fight with, and without any sharpening instruments. I call upon the superintendents of literary institutions to see to it that the men who go into class-rooms to stand beside the Leyden jars, and the electric batteries, and the microscopes and telescopes, be children of God, not Philistines. The Carlylian, Emerson, and Tyndallean thinkers of this day are trying to get all the intellectual weapons of this century in their own grasp.

What we want is scientific Christians to capture the science, and scholastic Christians to capture the scholarship, and philosophic Christians to capture philosophy, and lecturing Christians, to take back the lecturing platform. We want to send out against Schenkel and Straues and Renan, a Theodore Christlieb of Bonn; and against the infidel scientists of the day, a God-worshipping Silliman and Hitchcock and Agassiz. We want to capture all the philosophical apparatus, and swing around the telescopes on the swivel, until through them we can see the morning star of the Redeemer, and with mineralogical hammer discover the "Rock of Ages," and amid the flora of the realms find the "Rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley." We want a clergy learned enough to discourse of the human eye, showing it to be a microscope and telescope in one instrument, with eight hundred wonderful contrivances, and lids closing 30,000 or 40,000 times a day; all its muscles and nerves and bones showing the infinite skill of an infinite God, and then winding up with the peroration: "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" And then we want to discourse about the human, its wonderful integuments, membranes, and vibration, and its chain of small bones, and its auditory nerve, closing with the question: "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear?" And we want some one able to expound the first chapter of Genesis, bringing to it the geology and the astronomy of the world, until, as Job suggested, "the stones shall be in league" with the truth, and "the stars in their course shall fight against Sisera."

Oh, Church of God, go out and recapture these weapons. Let men of God go out and take possession of the platform. Let the debauched printing-press of this country be recaptured for Christ, and the reporters, and the type-setters, and the editors, and publishers made to swear allegiance to the Lord God of truth. Ah, my friend, that day must come, and if the great body of Christian men have not the faith, or the courage, or the consecration to do it, then let some Jonathan, on his busy hands and on his praying knees, climb up on the rock of hindrance, and in the name of the Lord God of Israel slash to pieces those literary Philistines. If these men will not be converted to God, then they must be destroyed.

YOUNG MEN TO THE FRONT.

THERE are places innumerable where young men can go and find libraries and secular literature, but to the Young Men's Christian Associations be the honor of having established reading-rooms where the spiritual and immortal nature finds healthful culture. The only way to fight bad books and diseased literature is by Gospelized literature. The only way to drive out unwholesome pictures is by pure engravings and wood-cuts. Give it a fair chance, and one sharp Christian pen will conquer fifty that are iniquitous, though they be golden and diamond handled. A reading-room armed with evangelical magazines and newspapers is one of the mightiest agencies of the Young Men's Christian Associations.

How many of our youth have, through this institution, been saved for this world and the next, we could not estimate. There is but a poor chance for a young man when he comes to town, unless this institution meets him. The first six months in the city have swamped many a young man forever.

The most of you were born in the country. You remember the farm-house, the brook where you waded knee-deep for pebbles; the old hickory of the woods which you climbed for nuts; the old pear tree behind the house which you shook for fruit; the path along which you drove the cattle a-field, or over which they came, when at even-tide they were waiting with their heads through the bars. You remember the first time you saw a great town; your blood tingled, your eyes danced. Your country residence had not prepared you for what you were to see and hear. We admit that there were sins among granaries and corn cribs as certainly as among custom-houses and broker-shops, but they were less elaborate and deceptive. The trees never issue false stock. Wheat fields are never guilty of dishonorable competitions. The gold on the grain is never counterfeit. Buckwheat fields from drought may ask an "extension of time," but hardly ever make a total failure. Rivers are almost always "current." Acquaintance with the cattle on a thousand hills is no preparation for the "bulls and bears" of the money market. You slept in your country home the night long without having the doors locked, so you were not prepared to hear the slam of bolts and snap of patented spring locks. Then you carried your money loosely about you; but now you run against the placard, "Beware of pickpockets!" Then, when men offered you services, you knew it was from disinterested motives; now you say, "How much do you ask?" You found that you had suddenly entered upon a new world. You found yourself among some to whom honesty meant stealing beyond the law's reach.

In the moment of fresh arrival in town, the Young Men's Christian Association has saved tens of thousands, and that is the time to do the work—namely, before they are lost. It is a grand thing to help ashore the shipwrecked, but a grander thing to provide a compass and give the warning before they crash into the rocks. May God save our young men from the seething, scalding, blasting, damning temptations of city life. Foremost and mightiest in that work are the Young Men's Christian Associations. May God multiply and augment them!

GOOD AND BAD ANGELS.

I ONCE saw a tragedy on a street corner. A young man, evidently doubting as to which direction he had better take. Splendid young man. Cultured young man. Honored young man. Why did he stop there while so many were going up and down? The fact is, that every man has a good angel and a bad angel contending for the mastery of his spirit, and there was a good angel and a bad angel struggling with that young man's soul at the corner of the street. "Come with me," said the good angel; "I will take you home; I will spread my wing over your pillow; I will lovingly escort you all through life under supernatural protection; I will bless every cup you drink out of, every couch you rest on, every doorway you enter; I will consecrate your tears when you weep, your sweat when you toil, and at the last I will hand over your grave into the hand of the bright angel of a Christian resurrection."

"No, no," said the bad angel, "come with me; I have something better to offer; the wines I pour are from chalices of bewitching carousal; the dance I lead is over floor tessellated with unrestrained indulgencies; there is no God to frown on the temples of sin where I worship. The skies are Italian. The paths I tread are through meadows, daisied and primrosed. Come with me."

The young man hesitated at a time when hesitation was ruin, annd the bad angel smote the good angel until it departed, spreading wings through the starlight upward and away, until a door flashed open in the sky and forever it vanished. That was the turning point in that young man's history; for, the good angel flown, he hesitated no longer, but started on a pathway which is beautiful at the opening, but blasted at the last. The bad angel, leading the way, opened gate after gate, and at each gate the road became rougher and the sky more lurid. Passed each portal, there was a grinding of locks and a shoving of bolts; and the scenery on either side the road changed from gardens to deserts, and the June air became a cutting December blast, and the bright wings of the bad angel turned to sackcloth, and the eyes of light became hollow with hopeless grief, and the fountains, that at the start had tossed with wine, poured forth bubbling tears and foaming, and on the other side the road there was a serpent, and the man said unto the bad angel, "What is that serpent?" and the answer was, "That is the serpent of stinging remorse."

On the left side the road there was a lion, and the man asked the bad angel, "What is that lion?" and the answer was "That is the lion of all-devouring despair." A vulture flew through the sky, and the man asked the bad angel, "What is that vulture?" and the answer was "That is the vulture waiting for the carcasses of the slain." And then the man began to try to pull off of him the folds of something that had wound him round and round, and he said to the bad angel, "What is it that twists me in this awful convolution?" and the answer was, "That is the worm that never dies!" And then the man said to the bad angel, "What does all this mean? I trusted in what you said at the street corner; I trusted it all, and why have you thus deceived me?" Then the last deception fell off the charmer, and it said: "I was sent forth from the pit to destroy your soul; I watched my chance for many a long year; when you hesitated that night I gained my triumph!"

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

BOOKS WHICH HAVE HELPED ME.

"TELL me the books which have helped you in your religious life, Mr. Yatman?" Thus a friend sought me one day with his queries. It may be my answer will help others.

First, my own Bible. It is one with a wide margin for notes, and full of references, with a text-book in the back. This has been my greatest help, for I have the pencil and ink notes which I have made, from time to time, on texts and chapters, and little gems gathered here and there, stored away on the margins and blank leaves. There never will be much growth in grace, till a Christian gets a Bible of his own, and knows it like a good housekeeper knows the house.

Second, my Illustration Book. This is a little book I have made and had bound. As a Christian, I know I ought to contribute my share in making religious meetings good; and finding how powerful illustration was to help folks understand the truth of Scripture, I began to collect from every source, all good illustrations which I could use well, and here they are stored up for service. That and my Bible go together.

Third, Arthur's "Tongue of Fire." I doubt if there is a better book for hungry Christians than this; it is almost inspired. Its presentation of the Holy Spirit is such as to set one seeking for the treasure of power, till he come forth anointed for service.

Fourth—"The Life and Lectures of Charles G. Finney." There is something so marvelous in this man's life, at and after conversion, that for real spiritual stimulant it has no equal. He deals with God and truth and sinners in such a way as to leave no doubt of divine guidance. And for me, I like to trace the lives and work and writings of God-led men.

Stalker's "Life of Christ and Paul," put things in such clear shape for understanding that much help came from them.

"The Life of John G. Paton," in the "New Hebrides" helped my faith very much. Spurgeon's Lectures to his students, and Mrs. Booth's "Aggressive Christianity," had no small effect both on my mind and heart when I read them, which I did over and over again.

The little tracts "House-top Saint" and "Thanksgiving Ann" are bits of writing born of wisdom and love.

I have saved to the last the one book which I think and feel has in it the power to entertain, instruct, guide and bless, by repeated readings, and that is "Pilgrim's Progress." I'm quite sure, though you may have read it once or even a dozen times, yet there is gold to be had by going over it again. Try it.

Seven Times a Day.

There are some very weak Christians, very weak indeed; and there is no sunshine of joy for them, because they fall into sin so often. If not actual transgression, it's so near the border line that nice distinctions are not made by them in judgment, and under condemnation they go, and there they stay most of the time.

I pity them! and have been searching out of the Bible what I could find. Of course the staid, old, orthodox saint will say, "give them passages on Victory, and the power of grace, and such like."

Well, yes, I suppose that's good advice; but God himself can't make a calf out of a cat, or at least he doesn't; and the very make-up of these people is such, that to expect strong, robust Christians out of them, is to expect bass-wood to be as hard as hickory. There is no use expecting it; you cannot make watch-springs out of wood.

But, again, to my findings in the Scripture for them. It all came so sweet where he tells us if one sins and repents, we are to forgive him: and if he sins seven times a day and repents every time, we are to forgive him; and then the "seventy times seven" story came to add its testimony to what should be done, and after reading all, I said, "Well, if he, the great Teacher, tells us thus we must do, he himself surely will not do less."

So I write unto you weaklings, taking all the risk which I know I run, and say to you, whether up or down, keep your mind on the mercy of God.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE FIRST AMBASSADOR.

THE appointment of Mr. Bayard as Ambassador to England has received general approval throughout the country. There is a common belief among men of all parties that he will represent this nation with dignity, wisdom and discretion. He brings to his new duties a long experience in public affairs. For about eighteen years he was the leader of his party in the Senate, and for four years he was Secretary of State. He is therefore familiar with all the subjects with which it will be his duty to deal, and especially with the relations of our Government to the country to which he is accredited, as the English difficulties were the chief business of the State Department while he was at the head of it. His new title of Ambassador is unfamiliar, as since the early years of the Republic the Government has been represented at foreign courts by ministers plenipotentiary. Congress, however, authorized the change in order that our representatives abroad might enjoy the respect, dignities and honors which European courts accord to the higher rank. We also derive an advantage in the type of men which those courts will now send to Washington. They will no longer be diplomats of the lower order. The duties to be performed will be practically the same though the Ambassador has larger powers and more privileges than the Minister. He is supposed to be more directly a personal representative of the head of his Government and as such is entitled to greater respect. It is significant that the title is used in the Bible in relation to preachers of the Gospel. They are, says Paul, "ambassadors for Christ" and as there can be no higher dignity, so their mission is one of transcendent importance. Its supreme object is to persuade men to be reconciled to God. (II. Cor. 5 : 20.)

A City in a Volcano.

In a recent letter from Japan to the Springfield Republican, an American traveler describes a visit he had just paid to the volcano of Aso San, thirty miles from Kumamoto. In ascending to the crater, which is the largest in the world, being more than thirty miles in circumference, he was surprised to find a city of twenty thousand inhabitants nestling within its walls. The sides of the crater tower around it to a height of eight hundred feet, completely shutting it off from view. There was plenty of evidence that the volcano was not extinct, in the hot springs that abound throughout the city. In one place the visitor found a stream of hot water, brick-red, which was being used to turn the wheel of a rice-mill. The inner crater is an aperture about half a mile in diameter. It is only a short distance from the city, but it is plainly visible, by the high column of steam which continually arises from it. Nine years ago it caused some alarm by spouting up vast quantities of black ashes and dust. This continued for three days, and during the time semi-darkness prevailed in the adjacent city, and the people were much terrified. But the discharge ceased as abruptly as it began, and the normal ejection of steam was resumed. There seemed to the visitor an utter absence of apprehension in the homes of the people in this strange city. Peaceful farms producing excellent crops, school houses and sacred shrines were to be found there, as in other cities of Japan. How people could live calmly and contentedly in such a place with the knowledge that at any time the volcano might burst into activity and engulf them in its horrible fires, was a mystery to the visitor. But he can see a still greater mystery nearer home. In any American town he can find men who know that they must die, and who believe that an awful doom awaits them then, yet are unconcerned, and go about their business as if they were in no peril (Luke 12: 19, 20.)

A Guest of Rank.

A strange incident of the Inauguration ceremonies has just come to light, and is related by the Washington Star. It appears that a lady who lives not far from the capitol in Washington invited a party to luncheon on Inauguration Day. An elaborate repast was prepared, but the guests did not come. The severity of the weather was ultimately found to have been the cause of their absence. The disappointed hostess, not willing that the viands be wasted, thought of the soldiers in front of the house. She suggested to her husband that as their friends had failed to come he go out and invite some of the shivering men to come in. To this her husband assented, and seeing a little group of soldiers standing apart from the others he invited them all. They accepted, and after partaking of the eatables and coffee the leader of the party thanked the lady for her kindness, and requested her name, which being given, he informed the hostess that he was Gov. Russell of Massachusetts, and that his companions were members of his staff. She must have been greatly surprised as well as gratified. Similar surprise will be felt at the last great day when rewards are distributed, and it is found by some who have relieved the poor for Christ's sake, that they have unawares done a kindness to the children of the King (Matt. 25: 37.)

A Marriage Under Government Auspices

An American lady who is shortly to be married has had to make provision for obtaining the consent of the Emperor of Germany to the nuptials. It appears that her lover is an officer in the German army, whose suit has been accepted by the lady and approved by her mother. But the young man is required by law to show that he has an assured income of $620 annually, before he can marry, and he must also have the Emperor's consent. He was unable to fulfil the financial condition; but the bride is the possessor of a large fortune, bequeathed to her by her father, who died a few years ago. Her trustees have invested in German bonds a sufficient sum to produce the stipulated income, and the bonds have been deposited with the Minister of War at Dresden, as security that the investment shall be permanent. Thus qualified, the officer has applied to the Emperor for his consent, and when that is granted, which is regarded as certain, the marriage will take place. It is well for the lover that the lady is able and willing thus to remove the obstacles to their union. When the obstacles are of that character it usually rests with the lover to remove them and the achievement sometimes costs him years of labor and self-denial. Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and it is the glory of the Church that the Lord so loved her that he gave his own blood for her redemption. (Eph. 5: 25-27.)

HON. THOMAS F. BAYARD, AMBASSADOR TO ENGLAND.

To Prevent Suicide.

A recent suicide in New York gives significance to a discussion which took place on March 16, at the meeting of the Society of Medical Jurisprudence. The question before the society was as to the best mode of dealing legally with the crime of self-murder. One eminent physician expressed the opinion that all legislation on the subject was useless. He called attention to the fact, that in spite of the stringent law of the State for the punishment of intending suicides, only one conviction had been secured under it. In that case the man had been in prison for ten years for jumping into the river while suffering from delirium tremens. The effect of prescribing penalties was only to make the intending suicide more careful to escape them by providing against failure in carrying out his purpose. The old English law, which provided that the estate of a suicide should be confiscated, and his body buried at the junction of four cross roads with a stake driven through it, was equally inoperative as a deterrent. A man sufficiently desperate to commit suicide, he said, did not care what became of his body or estate. The doctor might have added that neither did the man care what became of his soul, which is really in such a case the most important consideration, for the suicide, when he is mentally responsible, is a murderer, and as such is warned that he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven (Rev. 22: 15.)

A Heart Literally Broken.

In a recently published volume by an eminent surgeon, a remarkable instance of a broken heart is described. It is stated that Dr. J. K. Mitchell, of Jefferson College, Philadelphia, was formerly surgeon on board a ship plying between Liverpool and American ports. The doctor formed a close friendship with the captain of the ship and during their voyages had much pleasant intercourse with him. During their last voyage together, the captain informed Dr. Mitchell that a long pending courtship, of which he had frequently spoken, had taken a favorable turn and on the arrival of the vessel in port he was to be married. Upon this subject he evinced great warmth of feeling, and showed some costly jewels and ornaments which he intended to present as bridal gifts. On reaching his destination he was abruptly informed that the lady had married some one else. Instantly the captain was observed to clasp his hand to his breast and fall heavily to the ground. He was taken up dead. A post-mortem examination revealed the cause. His heart was found literally torn in twain. The tremendous propulsion of blood, consequent upon such a violent nervous shock, forced the powerful muscular tissues asunder, and life was at an end. It would appear from this case that we may be nearer the actual truth than we suppose when we speak of people dying broken-hearted. But in the spiritual sense the word is in direct contrast, for while life was at an end when the captain's heart broke, life in its best sense is just beginning when the sinner's heart is broken by divine grace. (Ps. 34: 18.)

Mortgaged His Father's Grave.

A dispute about a lot in Mount Hope Cemetery, Boston, Mass., is pending and will probably involve litigation. It arose out of a money lending transaction. A young man who wanted to borrow a hundred dollars found that he could not do so without giving security. The only collateral he could offer was the ownership of a lot in the cemetery in which his father and mother are buried. The money was advanced on that security and the borrower gave a note for the amount at sixty days. He also signed an undertaking that if he did not pay at the time stipulated, he would have the bodies removed from the lot. He was unable to pay, but the cemetery trustees refuse to permit him to fulfil his agreement. They contend that the lot was originally sold subject to their regulations, one of which prohibits the removal of a body without their consent. There have been severe comments on the heartlessness of a son who risked the disturbance of his parents' bodies from their last resting place. Perhaps he consoles himself with the thought that his parents are safe with God and will not now care where their bodies may lie. We may hope that is true. No misconduct on his part could cause them to lose their eternal habitation, but it could cause him to lose his own, which would be an infinitely greater loss than the loss of a grave. (Luke 12: 4, 5.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Baptist Missionary Society in England is raising a special fund in celebration of its centenary. Already $550,065 is contributed.

Prince Oscar Bernadotte, the second son of the King of Sweden, has organized a Total Abstinence Society among the soldiers at Carlskrona, and he has accepted the office of president of it.

A remarkable revival has been witnessed at Babylon, L.I., under the preaching of Evangelists A. J. Smith and William Billings. Even the saloon-keepers closed their places under the interest that was aroused and the meetings were thronged by eager listeners.

Dr. A. J. Gordon's appeal to his congregation in the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, on a recent Sunday on behalf of the Centennial fund for Foreign Missions, received a liberal response. The collection amounted to $8,500 which makes the contribution of Dr. Gordon's church to Foreign Missions this year no less than $16,000.

Rev. Jacob Freshman has returned from his five months preaching and lecturing tour and has resumed his work at the Hebrew Christian Church in St. Mark's Place, New York. Mr. Freshman received a warm welcome there last Sunday morning. He announced that in the future he would preach every Sunday morning in German and every Sunday evening in English.

At Rising City, Neb., Evangelists Billings and Byers have been holding successful services. The meetings were the largest ever known in the neighborhood and many professed their faith in Christ after the meeting closed. The evangelists proceeded to Springfield, Neb., at special invitation to commence a campaign there.

A full report of the Northwestern Christian Convention, conducted at Minneapolis last month by Revs. B. Fay Mills and J. Wilbur Chapman has been issued. It contains beside the addresses of the two evangelists, a general report of the three days' proceedings. It has been published for the Committee by Horace B. Hudson, 400 Bank of Commerce Building, Minneapolis, Minn.

The Quinn Anti-Gambling car, Roanoke, is at Fostoria, O. Over twenty services have been held since leaving Washington, D. C., on a Western tour, and large audiences have gathered to hear Evangelist Quinn's eloquent exposures of the vice of gambling. Many have signed the anti-gambling pledge. Friends of the crusade can address Secretary O. S. Palmer at 142 Monroe Street, Chicago.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services at Muscatine, Ia., have been followed by large accessions to the churches. From the cards signed it appeared that 110 would join the Methodists; 78 the Congregational Church; 64 the Baptist; 63 Presbyterian and the others are distributed among the United Brethren, Lutheran, Protestant Episcopal, etc. It is believed that over six hundred souls were brought in during the meetings and many more were deeply impressed who are now under the care of the pastors of the city.

A novel feature of Temperance work has been adopted at the village of Eyota, Minn. The village recently voted no license. One of the difficulties was that the funds for lighting the streets were derived from the license fees and it was feared that when license was abolished the streets would be in darkness. The Women's Christian Temperance Union obtained charge of the street lamps, raised money for oil by subscription, and allotted a lamp to each girl, whose pleasure it will be to keep it trimmed and burning.

Contributions to the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $33. They were from: Josie A., Newark, N. J., 50 cents; John F. Boyle, Olmity, Kan., $10; Subscriber, Haydenville, Mass., $1; Mrs. A. B., N. Y. City, $1; S. Melville, Heislerville, N. J., $1; Loren Peterson, Occidental, Cal., $1; R. A. McM., Gatesville, Tex., $1.50; M. S., Lewiston, Pa., $2; Subscriber, Sug Creek, O., $10; M. E. Andrews, Prophetstown, Ill., $3; Dick Gray, Livingston Manor, N. Y., $1; S. S. Wise, Toledo, O., $1.

Rev. Thomas Harrison commenced his revival campaign in the Brooklyn Tabernacle on Good Friday, March 31, under very auspicious circumstances. On Sunday evening he had an audience of more than five thousand persons. When he invited those who desired the prayers of God's people for their conversion to stand up, over two hundred rose. The inquiry room was not large enough to contain all who remained after the service for personal conversation. The meetings are being held every evening in the week except Saturday.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

IN ROYAL ROBE AND DIADEM.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, April 9, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D. Text: Isa. 61: 10. "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God: for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels."

THE sixtieth chapter of Isaiah begins a beautiful and glorious description of the golden age of the Messiah. This description continues through the sixty-first and the sixty-second chapters. The blessings of that period are represented as numerous and glorious. They are described in the exalted and poetic imagery so often employed by the prophets, and especially by the evangelical prophet Isaiah. This prophet, in harmony with his usual method of foretelling, puts himself into the midst of the scenes which he so strikingly describes. In this connection he portrays the time when the Gentiles shall be gathered in, and when the whole earth shall be illumined with the glory of gospel truth. The sixty-first chapter is a marked portion of this grand description; it sets before us the blessed results of the coming and the work of the Messiah. In the text we have the language of the prophet himself, or of some other who speaks authoratively on behalf of Zion. The truth here taught is that the prosperity of Zion, the true church and kingdom of the Messiah, is a sufficient cause for rapturous joy; and that this prosperity should lead all God's true people to give thanksgiving for the great mercy experienced in the reign of the Messiah.

A Joyful Age.

But all true Christians in our day are as really the people of God as were the saints in the days of Isaiah, and they can make this language their own. They more truly than God's people of that earlier day can rejoice in the grace of God in their own hearts, and in the spread of the kingdom of God throughout the world. The world never was so small, so far as the means of reaching all its parts are concerned, as it is to-day. All the inventions and discoveries of the hour are contributing to the spread of the Gospel and to the establishment of the kingdom of God. Telephones and telegraphs have made the world a whispering gallery to echo the story of redeeming love. Steamships and railways in carrying God's messengers are instruments for the spread of the Gospel and for the salvation of the race. Never before might the church so rejoice in the glory of God's grace as to-day. In looking more closely at this text we see that it gives us its salient thoughts with great clearness and with equal beauty.

This text contains, in the first place, a joyous resolution: "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, and my soul shall be joyful in my God." The joy spoken of here is described as great. Those who rejoice in God have greatly. No other joy can be half so joyful; no other joy is worthy the name. The joy of this world perishes even while it is used; but the joy which comes from heavenly things increases with the using, and it shall be enjoyed more fully in heaven than upon the earth. In speaking of this heavenly joy extravagance is impossible; in attempting adequately to represent its greatness economy in statement is sinful. If our joy be in God we cannot rejoice too much. Well might the psalmist say, in the second verse of the thirty-fourth psalm, "My soul shall make her boast in the Lord." Boasting in God is not only justifiable but its absence is unpardonable. The psalmist recognized God as the fountain whence his joy sprang in a full and continuous stream. No [illegible] self and exalts only God as the object of his trust and the subject of his boast. If our joy [illegible] the perfection of his character and in the preciousness of his love, will be in our joy. Only as God is in our joy can joy be truly joy. The first Gospel song which earth ever heard was a song of ineffable joy. In that moment of tremulous excitement when there came to the heart of the Hebrew maiden the realization of all the honor that was to come to her, and all the blessing that through her was to come to the world, she burst forth in a song of holy ecstacy. The lofty words of the lowly Hannah came spontaneously to her lips. Her soul was saturated with the of the saints; she was imbued with their spirit, and her thoughts naturally took the form of this glorious Old Testament poetry. And so the gentle maiden sang, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour." And the "Magnificat" of Mary has echoed through loyal hearts ever since, and has found expression on the lips of men and women under the spell of lyric impulse and of religious emotion. The "Benedictus" of Zacharias was the natural echo of the Magnificat of Mary; and soon the "Gloria in Excelsis" of the angels is heard. The birth of the Lord gave them, as well as us, new cause for joy. Over the plains of Bethlehem rang their voices making night melodious with heavenly music. The birth of Christ was cause for joy to saints and seraphs in heaven, as well as to all pure hearts and noble souls on the earth. Indeed the whole atmosphere was tremulous with song at the time of the Lord's birth. Never before did loving hearts so utter themselves in lofty song as then. We are not surprised at the "Nunc Dimittis" of Simeon after we have listened to the other strains of music evoked by the rapturous emotion of that marvelous time. No wonder that Simeon, as he takes the divine babe into his arms, finds himself uttering strains of music which had long been shut up in his own reverent heart.

The noble Paul drank in

The Spirit of Joy

He says, "Rejoice evermore," and elsewhere, "Rejoice in the Lord always; and again, I say, rejoice. The apostle shows us that joy in the Lord is not simply a privilege but a duty. The apostle but echoes the words of the Old Testament prophet who states a profound psychological as well as a deeply religious principle when he affirms, "The joy of the Lord is your strength." Religion evermore gives joy. Religion makes joy bells ring in heaven and among redeemed souls on earth. It is an ancient, and also a satanic, slander to affirm that a religious life is a life of gloom. Satan, as his name implies, is evermore a slanderer. We have seen lives sad because they were without God and without hope. It is true that religion has its solemn elements; it is true that while Christ was annointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows, he was also the man of sorrows. All his people share with him in these times of sunshine and shadow. That is a shallow life which knows no lofty joy and no deep grief.

We see also that this is spiritual joy—"My soul shall be joyful." The joy here described is real, internal and spiritual. It springs from the deepest elements of the soul. It is a quality of the essential being. It is not a simulated but a genuine joy. It does not wreathe the face with with grief. In the experience of mere worldly joy there is often an aching heart beneath a bridal veil. Worldly pleasure cannot satisfy the heart's deep need, but true religious joy fills the soul, and springs up from the [illegible] It realizes in the noblest sense personal joy—"I will rejoice . . . my soul will be joyful." The heart thus becomes a well-spring of joy. This joy is not [illegible] from internal possession. It is not something which "haps" to one, but something which springs up from hidden sources within. Joy, therefore, is a much greater possession than mere happiness. Happiness comes or goes according to the frowns or smiles of external fortune, but joy remains because it has its origin within rather than without, and because it springs up from deep and inexhaustible sources within the soul itself. All without may be dark as deepest midnight, but all within may be bright as clearest noonday; without may be only the world's harsh discords, within there may be celestial harmonies. This joy was the blessed gift of Christ to his own before his crucifixion and after his resurrection; it was also his parting legacy as he went back to take his place on his Father's throne. This is the blessed peace which the world can neither give nor take away.

It is to be observed, further, that this is a resolution of divine joy—"Joy in the Lord." This thought we have already expressed, but it is here brought out with greater fulness of meaning. This is beautiful language; and the experience here suggested is a proper subject for the joy here declared. We can never exhaust the joy which Has God for its Source.

The life that is hid with Christ in God is a charmed life. It draws upon an unending fountain of blessing and source of delight. All the other streams may become dry; this stream cannot know diminution. Like a river with constantly multiplying tributaries, it flows on widening and deepening in its progress. One day this enlarged stream will pour itself into the ocean of eternity. All the world's fountains are not really fountains, but simply cisterns, and broken cisterns which can hold no water. When our lips are parched with thirst we reach the hand for some cup of earthly joy and we find that it is cracked, and that it contains no water; and at its bottom we find only poisonous sediment. Thrice happy is the man whose soul can be joyful in the Lord! That soul can be joyful in adversity as in prosperity, in darkness as in light, in shadow as in sunshine, in death as in life, and in eternity vastly more than in time! In the forty-fourth psalm and the eighth verse we have the thought expressed in the word, "In God we boast all the day long. Here not a momentary joy is described but a continual and increasing joy is expressed. Every true believer may have such joy here and now. We live far below our privileges when we are satisfied with dwelling rather than in the king's palace. We walk in the valley singing jeremiads, when we might leap on the hilltops singing hallelujahs; too often we insist upon calling ourselves servants when God proclaims us to be sons. Jesus Christ is our Emmanuel, God with us. He is perfect man and perfect God, he is the Son of Mary and the Son of God, he is the child of the manger and the Ancient of days. In God let our souls make their boast; with him on our side we can defy the world and the devil. Let us shout his praise and have even here sweet foretastes of the fuller joy we shall experience, and the grander victory we shall achieve in his immediate presence.

We have, in the second place, in this text, a sufficient reason for such a resolution, "For he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, etc." God reveals to the soul its need of clothing. Dr. Bushnell, in his suggestive discourse on "Putting on Christ," reminds us that the highest distinction of man, considered as an animal among animals, is not in his two-handedness nor in his erect figure, but in his necessity and right of dress. The lower animals have no option regarding their figure and appearance. Their dress is a part of their organization; it grows upon them as their bones grow within them. This is true whether their dress be feathers, fur, hair or wool; but man shows his superior dignity by the necessity of additional clothing and the high prerogative which he may exercise regarding its character. This remark is as true morally as it is physically. When the first pair sinned, which had been on their soul was lost; they, therefore, tried to substitute for it external garments of their own devising. Their act unconsciously declared their sin. Many men and women still follow their example. Education, refinement, culture and many other graces of manner are manufactured coverings for moral deformities. Proud men and women do not wish to be reminded that they are poor, and blind, and naked. Instead of turning against their moral defects, they are apt to turn against the preacher for uttering unwholesome truths. Except men be clothed with the garments of salvation, they are unclothed so far as the noblest elements of character and the highest attainments of divine culture are concerned.

God also reveals the fact that he alone can provide garments of salvation and robes of righteousness. This truth, also, men and women are slow to learn; they wish to help God. They desire a share in the work of salvation at a point where their service is neither needed nor possible. The enforcement of these solemn truths humbles pride and destroys self-sufficiency. Some men are so inflated with self-righteousness, that they think they have need neither of the mercy of God nor the cross of Christ. They sit at their own loom and weave their own robes; they act, so far as their moral nature is concerned, precisely as did our first parents in Eden in respect to their physical clothing. But even here at times these Pharisees discover and here and there put in the silver or golden thread of some good deed, some holy aspiration, or some saintly resolution. They expect that God's mercy will make up for all threadbare spots, ragged rents and deep-dyed stains. They would unite their rags to Christ's robes. Believe me, it is impossible to cover the soul in this way. You must put on Christ's robes, or you will not be suitably attired for the wedding feast; otherwise you will not have on the wedding garment. Quaintly has some one said that "the filthy rags of the first Adam must not be joined to the princely robes of the second Adam." We know, indeed, that Christ's righteousness is imparted as well as imputed; and when so imputed and imparted, all men take knowledge of its possessor that he has been with Jesus. Christ in the heart makes his presence seen in the life. He cannot be hid. A rose in our bosom will fill the atmosphere about us with its fragrance; so does Christ, the Rose of Sharon. In the robe of his righteousness there is no seam and no stain. Even the eye of infinite holiness and purity cannot see any defect in that perfect robe. Self-righteousness is no righteousness. Impurity cannot purify itself. Our prayers need to be prayed for; our very Tears Need Washing.

As well might a man lean for support on his shadow as for a guilty sinner to seek comfort and hope in his own goodness. As a ground of acceptance with God, our own righteousness is only "sinking sand." Christ will not share with us the glory of his finished work as a part of our justifying righteousness. We are told that Nidias, the great sculptor, was employed by the Athenians to make a statue of the goddess Diana, and he produced a masterpiece. It elicited his own admiration; it filled his soul with artistic enthusiasm. But self-glory took the place of devotion to his art, the place of reverence for the subject of his artistic labors and genius; and being anxious to hand his name down to posterity, we are told that he secretly engraved it in one of the folds of the drapery. When the Athenians discovered his duplicity, his unpatriotic ambition, his unartistic selfishness, they indignantly banished the man who had polluted the sanctity of their goddess. Self-righteous sinners to-day act the part of this ancient sculptor; they would add their own name to Christ's in his robe of perfect righteousness.

The true Christian is clothed with the garments of salvation and the robes of righteousness. The clothing is actually on his soul here and now. The Gospel armor is useless except it be put on; the bread of life worthless except it be eaten; Christ powerless to save, except by a living faith he is received into the soul.

The Second Robe.

Why should we have here both garments of salvation and a robe of righteousness? Some have suggested that we have here an instance of Hebrew parallelism; but I certainly think we have here more than a mere rhetorical form. The garments may refer to the needed grace, and the robe to the beauty and glory of religion. The soul is not only protected, but it is ornamented. The robe that was thrown over the shoulder was an article of beauty; it manifested the dignity, the royalty and the sonship of the wearer. We have here then the garments of the divine nuptials; we have the flowing robes of the heavenly kingdom. They can be made white only in the blood of the Lamb. Behold the redeemed in glory! Whence came they? See their flowing robes of spotless white! Marvelous mystery of redeeming love, these robes are made white by the cleansing power of blood. O precious truth! O blessed Gospel! O mighty Saviour! While the Roman soldiers at the foot of the cross were casting lots for Christ's seamless robe, he was preparing for you and me a seamless, spotless and sinless robe of righteousness. That robe by his grace I now offer you. It will hide your deformities. It will make you a son, a daughter of the Lord of life and glory. It will be the wedding garment for the King's feast. It will be the flowing robe of heaven's redeemed and triumphant inhabitants. Will you put it on? Will you receive Christ now? Then he will be your wisdom, your righteousness, and your redemption now and forevermore.

We have here also a striking comparison—"As a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels." We see that Christians thus attired are compared to a bridegroom decked with the priestly crown. It is of ideas, but a combination which the original words clearly suggest. The allusion, doubtless is to the magnificent robes of the high priest when performing his functions. Special reference is made to the mitre and the crown of gold on its front. The great truth is here taught that all true believers are priests and kings. They are heirs of glory; they are joint-heirs with Christ; theirs shall yet be, as two apostles have taught us, a triple crown—a crown of righteousness, a crown of life, and a crown of glory.

All these truths are again beautifully suggested by the description here given of the bride adorned with her jewels. The Bible exhausts all human relations in setting forth the blessedness of Christians. Human language can scarcely bear up at all times under the weight of human thought; but it breaks down utterly under the weight of God's thought when he strives to make known his relations to men, or the exalted positions to which by his grace he raises them. What tender thoughts gather about a bride's preparation for her marriage. Father and mother, brothers and sisters friends and neighbors wait upon her, and her slightest wish is considered and if possible gratified. She is she is the queen of the hour. Some of us have seen among the fjords of Norway marriage processions of the humble and yet noble peasants of that rugged country and brave people. On the brow of the peasant girl on this wonderful day rests a crown, while neighboring maidens with evident satisfaction, and perhaps with occasional envy, watch the marriage procession. This custom incarnates a universal thought and expresses an appropriate honor. In every country if the bride have wealth she takes from her jewel case rare ornaments for her adornment. Beloved, the Church is Christ's redeemed, beatified and beautified bride. He came from heaven to woo and to win her; he sought and found her; he redeemed, exalted and glorified her; he loves her with an everlasting love. She marches triumphantly through the wilderness leaning joyfully and trustfully on the arm of her beloved. She is going up to take her place by his side on his throne. His throne is large enough to welcome to his side all his redeemed; they are to share in his glory and to rejoice in his victory. Will you accept the honors which he offers to those who become kings and priests unto him and joint heirs with him to his Cross and throne?

O glorious bride of Christ, redeemed by his grace, adorned by his robe, glorified by his presence, march through this world singing already the first notes of that song which shall fill heaven's arches with its melodious music when the bride shall be seated with the heavenly Bridegroom on his glorious throne!

A MESSENGER LEARNING.

A servant of God, who has been living a life of faith for many years, relates that he was encouraged to commit himself to it by the confidence of an aged widow, which he was the instrument of justifying. "In my younger days in Scotland," he says, "I had a country charge. I returned one afternoon, fatigued with the day's work. As I came home I felt a strange prompting to visit a poor widow, who, with her invalid daughter, lived in a lonely cottage in an outlying part of the parish. I was naturally thinking only of the poor widow's spiritual needs; but when I reached her little house I was struck with its look of unwonted bareness and poverty. I began to inquire into their circumstances, and found their supplies had been utterly exhausted since the night before. I asked them what they had done. 'I just spread it out before the Lord!' 'Did you tell your case to any friend?' 'Oh, no, sir; naebody kens but himsel' and me! I ken he would not forget, but I didna ken hoo he wad help me till I saw you come riding over the brae, and then I said, 'There's the Lord's answer!' Many a time in a sore strait has the recollection of this incident encouraged me to hold fast my faith in the loving care of my Heavenly Father."

WATCHING FOR THE MORNING.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

"Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching." Luke 12: 3, 7.

WATCHING for that glad new morning,
When the glorious adorning
Of God's elect shall come;
Angel hands will gather in,
All free from every taint of sin,
To their eternal home.

Guests at the banquet of the Lord,
Each heart attuned in sweet accord;
Oh! who would not be there?
And who would not a "watcher" be Hoping e'er long his Lord to see?—
Thy soul for him prepare!

Prepare to join the white-robed throng,
And with them chant redemption's song,
Upon the shining shore.
With the "Chief Shepherd" always near,
No want, no care, no doubt, no fear,
What can one wish for more?

LEAD ME

COME, blessed Jesus, fill my heart
So full of love for thee,
That I shall always heed thy voice,
Rejoice thy voice to see.

Come lead me, Lord, come help me walk
The road thy sons should tread,
Cause me to feel with faith supreme,
Thy blood for me was shed.

Most gracious Saviour, guard my heart,
Make it entirely thine,
And teach me never, at thy will,
To murmur, or repine.

Oh! come and place thy loving arms
Around thy wayward child;
Come, let me feel thy sweet embrace
And feast upon thy smile.

My dear Redeemer, I would spread
O'er all this earth thy fame,
And in some heart, that knows thee not,
Light up Love's holy flame.

THE LORD'S RETURN.*

A Vivid Hope and Potent Influence with the Apostles and the Early Church.

BY PRINCIPAL RAINY, D. D.

PROBABLY there is no feature in which the average Christianity of to-day varies more from that of the early Christians, than in the faint impressions, and the faint influence, experienced by most modern Christians in connection with the expectation of the Lord's return. The difference seems to arise mainly from a secret failure of faith on this point, due to the impression made by long ages in which Christ has not come. "Where is the promise of his coming? All things continue as they were."

The expectation of the coming of Christ out of the world of supreme truth and purity, where God is known and served aright, to fulfil all his promises,—this is the Church's and the believer's great hope. It is set before us in the New Testament as a motive to every duty, as giving weight to every warning, as determining the attitude and character of all Christian life. In particular, we cannot deal aright with any of the earthly things committed to us, unless we deal with them in the light of Christ's expected coming. This expectation is to enter into the heart of every believer, and no one is warranted to overlook or make light of it. His coming, his appearing, the revelation of him, the revelation of his glory, the coming of his day, and so forth are pressed on us continually. In a true waiting for the day of Christ is gathered up the right regard to what he did and bore when he came first, and also a right regard to him as he is now the pledge and the sustainer of the soul's life: the one and the other are to pass onward to the hope of his appearing.

This may suggest, however, that influences are recognisable, tending to form, in modern Christians, a habit of thought and feeling less favorable to vivid expectation of Christ's coming. It does not arise so much in connection with individual experience, but is rather an impression drawn from history and from the common life of men. In the days of Paul, general history was simply discouraging to spiritual minds. Darkness, corruption, and social wrong continued to mark the scene, and there was little to suggest that prolonged effort might gradually work improvement. Rather it seemed that a rapid dispensation of grace, winning its way by supernatural energy, might well lead on to the winding up of the whole scene, sweeping all away before the advent of new heavens and a new earth. But, for us, nineteen hundred years have well-nigh passed. The Christian Church has been confronted all that time with her great task; and, however imperfect her light and her methods have often been, she has set processes agoing, and pressed on in lines of action, in which she has not been without her reward.

All this tends to fix the eye on what may happen before Christ comes; for one asks room and time to fight the battle out, to see the long co-operant processes converge upon their goal. The conflict is thought of as one to be bequeathed, like freedom's battle, from sire to son, through indefinite periods beyond which men do not very often look. Yet all this shall not replace the coming of Christ, and the redemption that draws nigh with him. The longing eyes that gaze into the prospects of public-spirited beneficence and Christian philanthropy, do well; but they must also look higher up and further on.

One thing must be said. It is vain for us to suppose we can adjust beforehand, the elements which enter into the future. Two ways of looking at the future are apt to strive together. The man who is occupied with processes that, as he conceives, might eventuate in a reign of goodness reached by gradual amelioration, by successive victories of the better cause, may look askance on the promise of Christ's coming, because he dislikes catastrophe and cataclysm. First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear, is his motto. And the man who is full of the thought of the Lord's return, and deeply persuaded that nothing less will eradicate the world's disease, may look with impatience on measures that seem to aim at slow and far results. But neither the one mode of view nor the other is to be sacrificed. Work is to be done in the world on the lines that promise best to bless the world. Yet also this faith must never be let down—The Lord is coming; the Lord shall come.

It is done in numerous instances but is to be regarded rather as an exception than the rule. In England and on the Continent generally it is much more common. There would seem to be no reasonable objection to the usage, and in cases where the family name of the lady is a distinguished one, it is now frequently adopted.

P., New York City. Of the various forms of government in the world at the present time, which one is most according to the will of God and agreeing with Scripture history?

The highest form of government ever known to mankind—a theocracy, with God as king and the high priest as his interpreter and administrator—was that of the Hebrews after the Exodus. It had many of the features of a democracy. Among modern governments, the republican form seems to be most harmonious with the divine will in human affairs. To demonstrate this fully would, however, require more space than we can afford to devote to the matter.

Mary C. Tison, Ococa, Fla., writes:

In a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I find the question, "What was the name of Mary's father?" PRAYING FOR OTHERS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 23. Job 42: 8-10; Phil. 1: 4-10.

No keener satire on religious teachers could have been written than that which the author of the Book of Job puts in the closing verses of his work. The three men, who represented the spiritual teachers of their day, have lectured Job and reproved him for the sins they imputed to him, have exhorted him to repent and return to God, and have assumed, quite in the orthodox manner, to speak for God, to explain his ways and to declare his will. They are on God's side and they settle all the difficult questions and pronounce harsh judgments in a way which we are very familiar with in this day. But God is represented as repudiating them altogether. They have done him grievous injustice by misrepresenting him. He is so angry with them that he will hold no communication with them. If they wish to make their peace with him, they must do it through Job. This poor man whom they have been hectoring and worrying and denouncing will be heard, and they must get him to plead for them. It is the lesson Christ taught in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. The despised man went to his house justified, while the proud Pharisee was unheard.

It is significant that the only result of Job's pleading for his friends that is recorded, is a result affecting Job himself. In pleading for others, he was blessed himself. This is by no means an uncommon result. It is a law of God's kingdom that no unselfish effort is wasted. The man who is concerned for the welfare of those about him and tries in any way to help them by his prayers and gifts, his sympathy or his labor, is a better man by his act. He becomes larger-hearted, stronger and happier through his altruism. The qualities he exercises, which develop by the exercise, as our muscles do, are the brightest and the most God-like in his nature. He rises out of the low, mean valley of his own being to the heights where the air is purer, more bracing and exhilarating. He is blessed, though he was not seeking a blessing for himself. Perhaps there is no man who has not proved the fact for himself in some degree. An entirely unselfish act of kindness is never done without a sensation of delight and satisfaction. Every one has experienced it at some time, though it may not have led to a continuance of similar effort. We are slow to learn and do not avail ourselves of the blessings wherewith God rewards those who walk in his ways. He would teach us to love and serve others, and he beckons us to the duty by rewarding every step. Beside this, there is the direct result of answered prayer. We may be sure that no prayers are so likely to be heard and granted as those we put up for others. They are offered in God's spirit and must be according to his will. Thus an opportunity of service is opened that is within the reach of all. When we can do nothing else to help a brother, we can pray for him. His heart may be closed against us, distance may prevent personal help, his affliction may be beyond human alleviation, but we may still help him by praying for him. Thus a double blessing rewards intercessory prayer.

A NOBLE KING'S DAUGHTER.

MENTION has frequently been made in these [illegible] of the progress of the Order of King's [illegible] in Great Britain. By the courtesy of the Silver Cross, we are enabled this week to present the portrait of the leader of the movement, her Grace the Dutchess of Bedford. This lady, whose rank in the peerage of great Britain is next in order to the Royal Family, is well known for her kindliness and public spirit. Like her sister, Lady Henry Somerset, whose recent visit to this country will be long remembered for the inspiration it gave to the friends of Temperance, the Duchess of Bedford has consecrated her life to the service of humanity. On her late husband's estates, the poor among the tenantry hold her in the highest esteem. Not only does she give freely to every good work among them, but personally visits them in their homes and learns by actual contact with them the difficulties and the burdens of their lot.

In the various public movements for the amelioration of social conditions she has taken a deep interest, especially in the Temperance reform. She has personally set the example of abstinence and has maintained her position on the question for eleven years. The fact is no slight evidence of her courage and strength of mind, considering the character of the society in which she moves. Unhappily there is need of such an example in that society, as well as in the lower ranks, and it is all the more difficult to set it. The introduction of the Order of King's Daughters in England enlisted her support at the outset and its members have done wisely in placing her at the head of their Executive Board. The sudden death of her husband a few weeks ago, will probably diminish her power of aiding the financial department of the Order, but her gifts were the least part of the service she has rendered. The kindliness and sympathetic spirit which have endeared her to her sisters in the Order in the past will, we may be sure, be not less conspicuous in the widow than they were in the wife.

A BROTHERLY MANIFESTO.

As some misunderstanding evidently prevails as to the relations of the Baptist Young People's Union with the Christian Endeavor Society, it is gratifying to have as clear an expression of fraternal feeling as that which is published by the President of the B. Y. P. U. of Minnesota. It is all the more significant because it is quoted with authoritative approval by the journal of the organization, the Young People's Union. It is in part as follows: "The Baptist Young People's Union is not hostile to Christian Endeavor. It is its hearty ally, its hearty supporter, with nothing but praise for it and a God-speed and a blessing upon the noble work it has wrought. The Baptist Young People's Union rejoices—most heartily rejoices—in welcoming to its fellowship every Christian Endeavor Society in a Baptist Church. It shall receive all the privileges of every sort which can be secured by any local society known distinctively as Baptist Union. All can now come together upon a common footing for a common purpose and unitedly we can go on in our Christian service without the disturbing fear that in some way a part of our young people are going to get outside of us. If you want Christian Endeavor, have it by all means. No one will say you nay. Affiliate with the State and national organization of Baptist Young People's Union, and let us know that your heart is with us and that we are to be one in every endeavor to bless and gladden the world." As the Epworth League is also identical in its aims and purposes with both organizations, the example of the Minnesota leader may be commended to the notice of its leaders as one that it might be well to follow. Union may not be possible in existing conditions, but there is no good reason against alliance.

AN ILLINOIS C. E. SOCIETY.

A TESTIMONY to the value of Christian Endeavor in a country church comes from Elliott, Ill. The Rev. Finley Reynolds, who is pastor of the Church of the United Brethren in that town, speaks in the highest terms of the services rendered by the young people of the Society to the church and pastor. It is only a young society, not yet a year old, but it has entered upon its work with a vigor that promises well for its future usefulness. It has now twenty-five members, which is a fair showing in one church in a town of about five hundred population, in an agricultural district. One department has already succeeded in raising funds for the purchase of a church bell, and another department it well on the way to the accumulation of a two hundred dollar fund with which a new pulpit and furniture is to be procured. When this is achieved, the Society has still other work before it, having pledged itself to the building of a Christian Endeavor Hall, which shall be the centre of work among the young folks of the district. A large portion of the people are Norwegians, and the additions to the population, which are coming in rapidly, are chiefly of the same nationality. There is no better class of immigrants than these intelligant, sober, industrious people from Northern Europe, so that there is every encouragement for earnest effort among them. It is all the more hopeful from the fact that the young people are thus planning to help the pastor, and if they are successful in erecting the proposed hall, a potent influence for good of the highest kind will be in operation.

A GOVERNOR ON THE Y. M. C. A.

AT the convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Alabama, held at Mobile on March 26, a most impressive address was delivered by Hon. W. J. Northen, Governor of Georgia. The Governor modestly said that he could not make a speech but he would like to give his hearers some results of his own experience. "The Young Men's Christian Association," he said, "helps the State. When you have good young men you have a good State. What constitutes a State? Not high battlements and so on, but men—good, honored men, who know their duty, and knowing, dare do it. In all this great work the Associations are doing they are doing it bravely. I dare say some of their salaries are stopped while they are absent, while they are working for your homes, your sons and your community, and if they fail they fail for lack of help and recognition." After recounting some painful experiences in receiving heart-broken wives and mothers who had come to him pleading for the commutation of sentences on husbands and sons who had fallen into the clutches of the law and after dwelling on the sad necessity he often felt for refusing their petitions, when he would gladly have granted them, he said: "Oh, but you say these things can't come upon my son. Who are you that the evil should respect your house? If only these mothers had written to the Young Men's Christian Association to take care of their boys they would both have been the happier for it. Help the association, in God's name, to make better men. When I see these fellows try to win back a fellow, I feel like taking them both in my arms and saying, God help them. Where is the man who says he cannot trust in you? These young men here to-night are not only young men, but business men. I believe in encouraging anything that's good and suppressing anything that is evil. I am going to stick up for these associations as long as I live, for they help me a great deal." Gov. Northen's testimony is valuable because of his position and his opportunities of observation.

THE ORPHAN

I HEAR the soft winds sighing
Through every bush and tree,
Where parents dear are lying
Away from love and me.
Tears from my eyes are starting,
And sorrow shades my brow;
Sad was the hour of parting—
I am an orphan now!

My heart is very lonely,
My spirit drear and sad:
'Twas their dear presence only
That made my spirit glad.
From morning until even
Cares rest upon my brow;
They're gone from me to heaven—
I am an orphan now!

They're living with the Saviour
In that bright land so fair;
Their sorrows o'er forever,
For sin ne'er enters there.
And soon they'll meet and greet me,
With crowns upon their brow.
They're happy with the angels:
I am an orphan now!—MAY E. WATERS.

An Equatorial Niagara.

"Mosi-oa-tunya" the "Smoke-Sounder," and its Mammoth Cataract, on the Zambesi River—A Region Little Known.

AFRICA holds many natural wonders with which the civilized world is yet very imperfectly acquainted. In the interesting interview with Rev. E. H. Richards, published in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, that devoted Gospel missionary and explorer announced his design of traversing the Zambesi Valley. This is the region that was known to the ancients as the empire of Monomotapa, but of the history of its people or the kings who ruled over them, nothing is now known save by tradition, transmitted through Arab sources.

First among Europeans to visit the Upper Zambesi was Livingstone, who entered the great valley about 1852. He discovered the Falls, when several years later he descended the Zambesi to the river's mouth. In 1859, accompanied by the explorer Kirk, he ascended the river as far as the Falls, traced its main tributary, the Shire River, and discovered Lake Nyassa. Since that time, although the entrance to the Zambesi is open to all nations, only a few travelers have ascended as far as the Falls, which rank among the grandest natural spectacles in the world.

The cataract is bounded on three sides by rocky ridges from 300 to 400 feet high, which, like many of the islands in the stream, are dotted with vegetation. Livingstone asserted that the Falls were formed by a vast crack or rent stretching across the hard black basalt which forms the bed of the river. From the chasm of 360 feet—twice the depth of Niagara—arise great columns of spray to such a height that they can be seen at a distance of twenty miles. Immediately below the Falls, the river is gorged and hemmed in by precipitous rocks, the passage being at some points only twenty or thirty yards wide.

Among the tribes of the Upper Zambesi are several who clothe themselves with skins, live upon milk, maize and sweet potatoes and work neatly in ivory.

Mr. Richards, who spent several years in Gazaland, describes the natives of that country as possessed of remarkable mechanical skill—superior probably to a majority of the other races of the Dark Continent. With the rudest of tools they execute carvings that show a surprising amount of artistic taste. Cups, pipes, bowls and quaint designs of many different sorts are wrought out with slow, laborious application, time being no consideration whatever to the native who never saw a watch or dreamed of a sun-dial, and whose keenest appreciation of the flight of the hours is guaged by his appetite.

Eighteen pieces of cloth are considered a fair price for a wife, the cloth passing as coin. Rubber is one of the chief products of the Zambesi Valley. An industrious native gathers rubber on balls, twisted on a stick, until he has altogether 100 pieces. Ten pieces of rubber equal in value one piece of cotton cloth, 100 pieces of rubber are the equivalent of ten pieces of cotton; 18 pieces will purchase a wife.

Among some of the tribes, wife-beating is in practice; indeed the woman seems to be little better than a beast of burden, or a slave among them. Her moral no less than her physical qualities are held in contempt. A young native stripling who is ambitious to become a warrior, loves nothing better than to secure by his own prowess the teeth of a lion, a leopard, or some other wild animal, as a trophy of his skill and daring. These trophies constitute the chief insignia of rank among the warriors; thus, one who has on his string of beads a few big pieces of bone or ivory of cube form is at once recognized as a great hunter or warrior, cubes of certain shapes and sizes denoting degrees of prowess, some the slaying of a lion and others the killing of a man. Some warriors, old in service, have so many of these ghastly reminders on their string of beads, that one cannot help thinking how bloody and cruel are the lives of those who live to manhood and old age without the refining influences of the Gospel.

Make Home a School.

MAKE home an institution of learning. Provide books for the centre-table, and for the library of the family. See that all the younger children attend the best schools, and interest yourself in their studies. If they have the taste for thorough cultivation, but not the means to pursue it, if possible, provide for a higher education. Daniel Webster taught at the intervals of his college course to aid an elder brother in the pursuit of a classical education, and a volume of his works is dedicated to the daughters of that brother, who early closed a brilliant career. Feel that an ignorant brother or sister will be a disgrace to your family, and trust not to the casual influence of the press, existing institutions, and the kind offices of strangers. If the family becomes, as it may be, an institution of learning, the whole land will be educated.

Old and Young Folks' Whims.

CHILDREN are supposed to be the most whimsical creatures in the world, and yet there have been grown men who were quite as much so as any child that ever lived. It is told of a little girl that she cannot go to sleep unless she has a piece of rubber held between her thumb and forefinger, which some people consider to be whimsical in the extreme; but what have these to say to Haydn, one of the greatest composers of music, who could not put two notes together until he had dressed himself in his best suit and had his hair powdered, and who declared that without a certain diamond ring, the gift of Frederick II. of Prussia, on his finger, he could not begin to work, since he could not summon a single idea into his head? Other composers have been equally whimsical. Of Gluck it is said that when he felt himself in a humor to compose he had his piano-forte carried into a beautiful meadow, where he was able to do justice to his muse. Another writer of music, Sarti, could compose only in a dark room lit by a single candle. This peculiarity showed itself in his work, for most of it indicates that he was a man of gloomy imagination.

Theorizing and Practicing.

"You may see continually girls who have never been taught to do a single useful thing thoroughly," once wrote John Ruskin, "who cannot sew, who cannot cook, who cannot cast an account, nor prepare a meal, whose whole life has been passed either in play or in pride. You will find girls like these, when they are earnest hearted, cast all their innate passion of religious spirit which was meant by God to support them through the irksomeness of daily toil, into grievous and vain meditation over the meaning of the great Book, of which no syllable was ever yet to be understood but through a deed; all the instinctive wisdom and mercy of their womanhood made vain, and the glory of their pure consciences warped into fruitless agony concerning questions which the laws of common serviceable life would have either solved for them in an instant, or kept out of their way. Give such a girl any true work that will make her active in the dawn and weary at night, with the consciousness that her fellow-creatures have indeed been the better for her day, and the powerless sorrow of her enthusiasm will transform itself into a majesty of radiant and beneficent peace."

About Swearing.

No man who swears, is a gentleman in the proper sense of that word, writes Rev. Peter Ainslie. A cloud rests over his home, for it is the house of irreverence. If all profanity should raise blisters on the tongue as it does on the soul, some men's mouths would be as open sepulchres and their cancerous and swollen tongues would be lolling from distorted mouths. God will summon them before the bar of justice to answer for this senseless wickedness. They will stand or fall by their own words. He may pass them by now, or he may smite them down with the brazen impudence upon their lips, as he did that youth near Ramsgate. During a fearful storm two boys sought protection beneath a tree. The younger was greatly alarmed, but the older boy treated the scene with carelessness, and, to show his bravery, even uttered fearful blasphemies against the storm; and with a dreadful oath, declared he would go to Ramsgate in spite of it. Just then a flash of lightning struck him dead upon the spot, burning off his clothes, and fracturing his skull. A stone marks the spot, and utters a warning voice to us: "Reader, prepare for eternity. A boy was struck dead here in the act of swearing."

SPRINGTIME IN THE COUNTRY.

THANK God, writes Dr. Talmage, for a good long, full breath in the country! Last evening we sped along on the wood. Our horse prefers to go fast and we like to please him; and what with the odor of spring and the breath of the woods, and the company with us in the carriage, and the moonlight—it was nothing less than enchantment. There is something in the country air to put one in blandest mood. We are at peace with all the world. We would not hurt a spider. We would take our bitterest foe and give him a camp-stool on the piazza. He should be persuaded that if we could not write good sermons and vivacious lectures, we can nevertheless raise good pumpkins, and long orange-carrots, and drumhead cabbage.

Congregations would be advantaged if for a few weeks of every year they would allow their pastors a little farm-life. Three weeks at a fashionable watering-place will not do the work. There is not enough salts and sulphur in all the springs to overcome the tight shoes, and the uncomfortable gloves, and the late hours, and the high living, and the dresses economical at the neck. Rather turn us out to physical work. A sharp hoe will hack to pieces all your dyspepsia. A pruning-knife will cut off the excrescences of your disposition. The dash of the shower that wets you to the skin will cool your spirit for ecclesiastical strife. The daily swinging of the axe will tone up your nerves. Trampling down the hay as it is tossed into the mow will tread into forgetfulness all your perplexities. In the wake of the plough you may pick up strength with which to battle public iniquity. Neighbors looking over the fence may think we are only weeding cantalopes, or splitting rails, or husking corn, when we are rebuilding our strength, enkindling our spirits, quickening our brain, purifying our theology, and blessing our souls.

Flowers seem to me the dividing-line between the physical and the spiritual. The stamen of the honeysuckle is the alabaster pillar at which the terrestrial and the celestial part and meet. Out of the cup of the water-lily earth and heaven drink. May the blessing of larkspur and sweet-william fall upon all the dwellers in country and town! Let there be some one to set a tuft of mignonette by every sick man's pillow, and plant a fuschia in every working-man's yard, and place a geranium in every sewing-girl's window, and twine a cypress about every poor man's grave. And, above all, may there come upon us the blessing of him whose footsteps the mosses mark, and whose breath is the redolence of flowers!

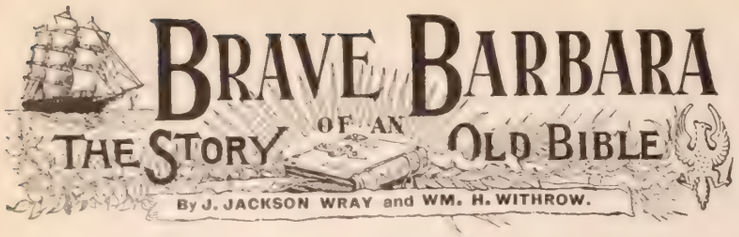
A Boy's Covenant.

ABOUT a hundred years ago, there lived in Strasburg a boy who, at the age of nineteen, wrote this solemn covenant with God: "Holy God, to thee I resign myself this day most solemnly. Hear, ye heavens, give ear thou earth! To-day I profess that the Lord is my God. Accept, O Lord, my word, and write it down in thy book, that henceforth I may be thine. In the name of the Lord of hosts, I resign all other masters who have heretofore ruled over me. I resign every transient thing, that God may be my all in all. To thee I devote all that I am and have, the powers of my soul, the members of my body, my time and my possessions. Help thou me, O Father, that I may employ everything to thy glory, using all in obedience to thy command. Grant me grace, O my God, to continue this covenant." This, kept and renewed in later years, gave to the world a John Frederick Oberlin, and made him instrumental in banishing ignorance, poverty and immorality from the wild mountain parish where he labored.



CHAPTER VI.

THE LOFT OUTGROWN.

The new home of Methodism in New York, though more commodious than any previously occupied by the immigrants, would seem very humble and inadequate to the Methodists of our time; but that poor loft in William Street occupies a hallowed place in history, for it was consecrated by the presence of the Spirit and by many prevailing prayers.

The historic "rigging-loft" was a long, low wooden shed. Its gable-end abutted on the street. Three broad wooden steps led up to the door. A broad, square-paned, old-fashioned window on each side of the door, had hitherto shown for sale such articles of the sail-maker's craft as could be stored there; two small windows over these, each flanked with the green Venetian shutters, completed the "front elevation," with the exception of a small diamond-shaped ornament let into the shingled wall beneath the point of the gable. Such was the outward semblance of the first "ark of the Lord" for the reception of seekers of the great salvation, dedicated to God by the pioneer Methodists of the New World.

Within this transformed sail and rope factory a rude pulpit was erected, and upon it was placed the somewhat expansive and imposing figure-head of a big ship, the gift of the previous occupier, who had small use of it, and probably grudged the cost and trouble of its transference to his new quarters. There was much contention, and a variety of opinions, as to what the colored and gilded effigy represented. Its last proprietor had hazy views on the subject, but he was bold enough to hazard the conjecture that it was a counterfeit presentment of King Solomon, and, therefore, found its fitting position in the high place where "Wisdom" was about to "lift up its voice."

As usual, the strong will and sound common sense and speechful force of Barbara Heck settled the matter to the general satisfaction.

"I have a shrewd notion," quoth she, "that the image is not meant to answer for the head of anybody in particular. The ship that carried it was most likely called 'The King,' or 'King of the Seas,' or 'Royal Monarch,' may be; a king it was surely meant for, and for that let it stand. It has found the very place it ought to fill and the very thing it ought to carry: to up-bear the word of God and to be the servant of King Jesus is the very thing that all kings ought to do and to be.

And so the great question was enthusiastically settled. The imposing figure-head became an excellent reading-desk. On it was laid the old black letter German Bible, brave Barbara's talisman, as it was called—both Embury and Webb used their own more portable copies of the Holy Book—on this, when the militant evangelist preached, he laid his sheathed sword, and from behind this, attired in full regimentals, he engaged in the higher and nobler warfare of the Prince of Peace!

It can easily be understood that this new and singular spectacle soon aroused the curiosity and interest of the citizens of New York. The gossipy Dutchmen of the place; the new colonial Britons who had swelled its numbers to find in it home and fortune, made it, all alike, the subject of wondering comment; and right soon the adventurous band of Christian worshippers found that even this new departure had not sufficed for their growing needs. Still the crowds increased; still the place was too strait for them, and still the prayer broke forth in spite of their new effort, "Give us room wherein to dwell!"

Squire Blake, whose ineffective raid on the little gathering at Philip Embury's I have already chronicled, was still sorely exercised in [illegible] ally attended the services held at the transformed rigging-house, and was often taken to [illegible] doing. But when taunted in this fashion, he said:

"Well, I don't wish even to seem to be encouraging treason, and heresy, and schism; but the presence of an officer of Captain Webb's devoted loyalty and high character makes me dubious of my own opinion; and when men of such reputation and social standing as Jan Stuyvesant attend their meetings, it seems to clothe them with respectability—but I don't know, I dont know," he continued, shaking his head dolefully, "it looks suspicious. Though I must say, the talk's good, very good; and as compared with what one's accustomed to hear—but there, a still tongue makes a wise head—"

This was said to a Boston skipper, Captain Ireton by name; for whom the suspicious custom-house officer was writing out clearance papers for the good ship, 'Betsy Jane,' bound for Barbadoes. That bluff sailor interrupted the Squire's flow of speech. Captain Ireton was strongly possessed by the democratic notions common enough in commercial circles in those days, notions which were ultimately to crystallise into the events of Bunker's Hill.

The demands upon his time and energies were now so heavy and constant that Philip Embury had given up his more distant vocation as a farmer, and had once again returned to the tools and the calling of a working carpenter, an employment with which he had been familiar in his Irish home beyond the sea. Like Paul, the tent-maker, he worked with his hands for his daily bread, and like Paul the Apostle, he dispensed to hungry multitudes the bread of life. Like him, too, he was "in peril oft," both among the hot politicians of both sides, who could not understand a man who was of no party but Christ's, and whose magnificent courage and prowess was all devoted to fighting the devil and leading the armies of the living God.

The decorous and respectable Squire Blake could not understand it. "It is a wild enough business," that worthy declared, in Philip's presence, "to see an officer who is both a scholar and a gentleman, usurping the place of an ordained clergyman in this lawless manner; but to see a mere mechanic, maker of shavings and sawdust, standing up to preach before his betters is intolerable. It is subversive of all social order!" he continued, waxing more and more indignant. "It confuses all distinctions of rank, and reduces the whole business of religion to an absurdity. What is the world coming to, I wonder? It is part and parcel of the flat rebellion which has come upon the land, and nothing less!"

"It were far better, Mr. Blake," replied the quiet and self possessed evangelist, "if the 'whole business of religion' was reduced to an absurdity. That it has been made a 'business' of at all has been the shame and curse of the so-called 'Christianity' which has been foisted on this God-forgetting, and money-getting city. Surely the times of this ignorance God hath winked at, but now he commandeth all men everywhere to repent! True, I am but a voice crying in the wilderness, but it is the 'Name' and not the voice; the Message and not the messenger that shall save this city! nor shall the messenger be hushed or daunted till the 'Name' is heard and loved and honored through all the land!"

"Have ye not heard," exclaimed brave Barbara, in her strong, sonorous tones, "how that the Lord himself was the carpenter of Nazareth? Verily, if these should hold their peace, the very stones would immediately cry out!" Turning to Pastor Embury, she lifted her hands and spoke as if, like a prophetess of old, she had a message from God, "O thou that bringest good tidings, get thee up amongst this people; lift up thy voice with strength! Lift it up, be not afraid! Say unto this city, Behold your God! Behold, the Lord God will come with a strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him; behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him!"

Such were the influences at work to let and hinder the work of the Lord in the growing States; such were the heroes, the heroines whose noble fidelity to Christ fostered and fanned the newly-kindled fires, and so circumvented the hosts of the Evil One that they did but help to spread the undying flame abroad. The old rigging-loft, great an advance though it had been on their first position, soon became too small for the sinewy church and pious peasants imported from the distant uplands of Munster; and swelling numbers of emigrants from the old continent, as well as from the conglomerate population of the city, flocked around their humble door.

Very various and very animated were the comments and the discussions that filled the air of New York as the result of the new doctrines, so simply put and so energetically maintained in the unlicensed conventicle by those who were called "ignorant and impudent sectaries" on the one hand, and "simple gospellers" on the other. A third party called them "enemies to king and country," a title which was stoutly protested against by the "Methody fanatics" themselves, who were loyal to the backbone.

In a little wooden shieling at the corner of William street, hard by the busy quay, dwelt a quaint widow woman, named Vause, who hailed from Nafferton, a rural village near the wolds of Yorkshire, and with her lived a couple of Cornish folks from the west of that granite-crusted country. These, having had early experiences of them Methody's in the old country, were ready enough to link their spiritual fortunes with those of Barbara Heck, whose indefatigable visits had brought them into the new Methodist home in the Western World.

"Deary me! who ever would ha' thought it?" said Widow Vause, "I remember hearing honest John Nelson many a time when he used to come into Yorkshire, an' fair stagger the Bairnsla' fooak wi' his preachin': an' now I've come to t'other side of the wolld to hear the saim sort o' Gospel! I didn't think so much of it, then, being young and foolish like; but, bless the Lord! what I'd forgotten then, I've gotten now, an' the love of Jesus fair makes me sing for joy!"

"Ay, marry, these are good times, neighbor Vause! I never heard John Nelson, though he set all Yorkshire in a flutter by his wonderful talk about the Saviour. But I do well remember hearing John Wesley hisself, down at Gwennap Pit, in dear old Cornwall; an' I've heard Sammy Bradburn, too, preachin' in the early early mornin' at the mine's mouth, an' in the evenin', when the lads came up to bank again."

This remarkable testimony from the lips of her lodger, Mrs. Penwidden, seemed to throw Widow Vause's experiences into the shade, for to be able to boast of having seen and heard John Wesley, was to be closely akin to fame. Still, she did not feel like subsiding in the presence of the greater honor without letting her light shine so far as it reflected the lustre of that brave soldier of the Cross—John Nelson.

"Eh! did you now? That was a thing to tell about! But I wish you could ha' seen John Nelson! I've seen him pelted through Bairnsla, an' Leeds, wi' rotten eggs. Ay, an' I've helped to do it mysen—being young and foolish, you know. This addendum was attached because the honest widow suddenly remembered that that was not so great an honor after all; and by way of toning it down still more, she added, "he was but a common soldier, you know, an' 'the parson' an' 'the squire' headed the mob agin' him."

Such is a fine specimen of "the talk of the town," in these early days of the "Great Revival, whose heaven-kindled fires had set those lands aflame.

Like flotsam and jetsam of the sea, these and similar atoms that formed the nucleus of the Methodist Church were blown across the broad Atlantic, from the white cliffs of Britain, the green shores of Ireland, the grey flats of Holland and elsewhere, and drifted, like seaweed, into the lively eddy of the old rigging-loft in William street.

One evening, after the close of the Sabbath services in the "rigging-loft," a little knot of the fervent worshipers were gathered in the house of Paul Heck, and the all-engrossing subject of "more space to dwell in" at once laid hold of the thought and voice of the entire company. The evening service had been attended by a crowd so large that the ungainly "loft" was simply and almost literally "chokefull," for many had fainted under the sweltering and oppressive heat. At the same time an eager multitude was thronging round the doors and windows in the hope of catching, through those widely-open avenues, some snatches from the lips of Philip Embury, of the "good Word of the kingdom."

"Well, well!" said the volunteer pastor, dropping wearily into a chair beside the open window that looked out into the garden, for he was tired "in the work, though not of it," as another evangelical pioneer used to say, "it is a fear something to put folks' lives in peril in this fashion. I do strongly fear that some who were carried forth from the great congregation are much hurt. I much misdoubt me that we are making more haste than the Lord wills, and that we are running faster than he hath sent. I fear that we shall have the worst speed." Having delivered himself of this gruesome bit of despondency, poor Philip, heaved a sigh of corresponding length and depth, and lapsed into silence. Would that all despondent "laborers in the vineyard had a Brave Barbara beside them to sing the songs of hope."

"Philip Embury!" said she, laying her hand on the arm of her beloved and life-long friend, "what evil spirit hath whispered such misfitting words in thy willing ear. 'Fearsome,' 'peril,' 'misdoubt, 'fear!' Marry, good friend, but the enemy of all brave soldiers hath put thee in parlous case, and like the poor man in Doubting Castle he cudgels thee sore. When the tide flows into the harbor the ship floats across the bar, and the crowds you moan about are God's voice crying aloud, 'Arise, and build me a house, that I may dwell therein!'"

Roused, in spite of himself, out of the Slough of Despond into which sheer physical exhaustion had plunged him, Philip answered eagerly, "Build! ay, but where? There's never a plot of ground in the place to be had for love nor money—that is," he continued, correcting himself, "not among the homes of the people where the house of God ought to be upreared."

"The Lord says, 'Build,' quoth the persistent Barbara; and he is not used to waste words, nor shall they return to him void. He cannot choose his own 'place,' and if he will, it shall come to us for 'love' or for 'money,' or with both. Is anything too hard for the Lord?"

"O, woman, great is thy faith!" quoted Captain Webb admiringly, for Barbara's strong stoutness of heart had impressed him greatly. "If you were a soldier, Mistress Heck, you are just the one to lead the way into the 'imminent and deadly breach."

"As much a soldier as yourself," Captain Webb," said Barbara, half playfully, half seriously, "only that your service is divided between King George and King Jesus, and mine—well, so far as King George is concerned, shall be always and only what the greater King allows."

"There speaks the old German Bible," said Barbara's husband, the steady, thoughtful, mainly-silent Paul Heck, bringing his hand smartly down upon his knee to emphasize the word. 'They that draw the sword shall perish by the sword,' is what your old Book says, good wife; and when the captain puts his sword across the Bible when he preaches about the Prince of Peace, I always feel as though the Book would shortly shut itself and cry aloud, 'Off, off, you have no business here!"

Here our honest and phlegmatic Paul who had astonished himself, as well as other people, by this sudden burst of feeling, and this eloquent assertion of opinion, bethought himself; looked timidly in the face of Captain Webb, and blushing like a school-boy, lapsed into silence. The Captain, it must be confessed, was mightily discomposed. I question whether he was much more startled when a French bullet robbed him of his eye. The fact is, that that particular aspect of his military calling had never been presented to his mind.

Barbara, who had a strong impression that, in this case, her good man Paul was a truer exponent of the doctrines of the Gospel of peace than was the man of war, deftly turned the train of conversation on to the main line again. "Talking about the 'deadly breach,' Captain, I wish you would make it plain to our captain, Philip, here, that the Lord doesn't need that he or anybody else should make a breach in any wall that interferes with his work and will. He just makes the wall to tumble over, and then uses the bricks to rear the work of his own hands."

"Have you heard," said John Lawrence, the young Irishman from Ballygarane, who was at this time a member of Paul Heck's household, and a valued "hired help" in his employ—"that the Mayor of New York has just bought all the open ground on the north side of John Street? That's the place for a new chapel! My word! but that's the spot to fight the devil from! It would make us masters of the city!"

Can Consumption be Cured?

This question is an interesting one to all—a vital one to many. We answer, "Yes." It is, however, true that in a large majority of cases it is not cured. So great is this proportion that the statement that one can cure consumption meets everywhere with great incredulity. Drs. Starkey & Palen, the discoverers and sole dispensers of Compound Oxygen stake their personal and professional reputation on the assertion that they have often cured consumption in their practice of twenty-three years. They court the fullest investigation of this declaration. They will prove it in the very words of many of the best and best known people in the country. They will, on request, mail a book which shows how and why Compound Oxygen cures this dread disease. If you have consumption; if you are threatened with consumption; or if your friend is so menaced, do not give up hope, but rather write us a plain statement of the case and have pointed out to you, without any expense, a well-traveled way of escape. Investigate and act at once. Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch St., Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

TIMID HINDOOS.

REV. A. HINDER, of Maharo, Bengal says: "During the past few months we have been busy itinerating in the outlying districts. Many villages were so hid away in the jungle it was difficult to find them. In some places the people were so surprised to see a white man entering their secluded village, that they would either run off to the jungles, leaving everything behind, or hide in their house, and ofttimes it was with great difficulty we could get them to come near us, and then it would only be by singing and our musical instruments. Superstition and fear have great hold upon these aboriginal people. Famine has disappeared, thank God, but cholera visited us for the second time. I had the joy of attending a great number of cases, and though I am not M. D. I knew the best method of dealing with the disease, and I had the Master's blessing upon the medicine dispensed, and all recovered except two cases in which the patients wese too far gone when they came to me." This help that the missionary is able to render in cases of sickness or injury becomes the surest passport to the good will of the people. It is all the greater pity that all missionaries are not physicians too.

strange as it may seem, is caused from a lack of that which is never exactly digested—fat. The greatest fact in connection with appears at this point—it is partly digested fat—and the most weakened digestion is quickly strengthened by it.

SPRING NO. 2.

Buffalo Lithia Water

certainly acts better than any extemporaneous solution of the Lithia Salts.

The efficacy of this water in affections of the nervous system, complicated with Bright's disease of the kidneys or with a gouty diathesis, nervous dyspepsia, nervous prostration, stone in the bladder, etc., etc., etc.

William A. Hammond, M.D. Washington, D.C., Surgeon-General U.S. Army (retired), formerly Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the University of New York, etc.: "There is a point in relation to the therapeutical efficacy of the Buffalo Lithia Water which has not as yet, I think, received sufficient attention. It is well known that many cases of diseases of the nervous system are complicated with lithæmia, and that unless this condition is removed a cure is very often retarded and not infrequently entirely prevented. It is quite commonly the case that in Cerebral Congestion producing Insomnia, Nervous Prostration, resulting from overmental work or much emotional disturbance, and in Epilepsy (to say nothing of the many cases of insanity) an excess of uric acid in the blood is often observed. This state appears to be altogether independent of the character of the food, for no matter how careful the physician may be in regard to the diet of his patient, the lithæmic condition continues. I have tried to overcome this persistence by the use of phosphate of ammonia and other so-called solvents for uric acid, but without notable effect.

"Several years ago, however, I began to treat such cases with Buffalo Lithia Water, with a result that was as astonishing to me as it was beneficial to the patient, so that now in all cases of nervous diseases under my charge in which there is an excess of uric acid in the blood, I use the Buffalo Lithia Water in large quantities. By this I mean that I do not have the patient drink merely a tumbler or two in the course of the day, but I flood him, so to speak, with the Water, making him drink a gallon or even more in the twenty-four hours. By this course the urine after a few days ceases to deposit uric acid crystals on standing, the morbid irritability of the patient disappears, the tongue becomes clean, the wandering pains in the head are abolished, and the system is rendered much more amenable to the special treatment which may be necessary for the cure of the disease from which the patient suffers."

"I have tried carbonate of lithia dissolved in water in various proportions, but it certainly does not, in cases to which I refer, have the same effect as Buffalo Lithia Water."

And as a matter of prime importance it is not to be forgotten that the composition of the Buffalo Lithia Water is such, and the experience of its use so complete, that no doubt exists of its great power not only as a solvent for calculi already in the bladder, but for the elements of such calculi existing in the blood.

A QUAKER'S BOND.

A DEVOTED family of the Society of Friends had lost their property, and were left almost penniless. The wife was sad indeed, and almost ready to despair; but her husband was cheerful. The wife was almost ready to "curse God and die." She was astonished at the coolness with which her husband met his lot; so she asked him one day, "Husband, how is it that you bear this trouble so well? It almost crushes me to earth." "Why, wife, we are not quite so bad as you imagine. We have a bond left which we can draw upon in case of need for it is fortunately 'on demand.'" "Why, husband, what bond do you mean? I thought we had lost all." "Oh, no. Here is the bond," and, opening the family Bible the good man read, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." "Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify me." His wife inquired, "Do you call that a bond?" "Yes," he replied; "it is a great deal surer bond than some of those we have lost." They failed us in our hour of need, but this never will." If Christian people would always take bond view of the Bible promise, they would be spared much anxiety and distress.

—washing with Pearline. Just try it and see. None of the rub, rub, rub that made the old washboard hateful. None of the old washboard, either. Nothing but common sense washing of clothes, paint, dishes, anything in the house—with something that takes out the dirt, instead of making you rub it out. It's a big difference. There's a saving in the labor—but, besides that, there's a saving in the wear.

Washing with acids and chemicals is easy, too—but it isn't safe. Washing with Pearline is.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled; if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 348 JAMES PYLE, New York.

FULLY GUARANTEED TO KEEP ACCURATE TIME.

It is fully as durable as the most expensive watch, and with fair usage will keep good time for TEN YEARS. This watch is being manufactured in lots of 100,000 at the rate of 1,000 PER DAY by the largest watch manufacturing concern in the world. This constitutes the sole reason for its low price. It is a practical illustration of what may be done in this country by machinery and skilled operators when an article can be sold in large quantities. Its parts are not made by hand by "Pauper European labor" as are most of the cheap watches now sold, which never run long and can never be repaired. Automatic machinery does everything in this watch, and every part is as true as a die can make it. The movement is the same as in all American watches, and is readily understood and repaired by any jeweler. Every Watch Timed, Tested, and Regulated before leaving our hands, and carefully packed with chain.

PREACHING CHRIST IN THE WILDERNESS.

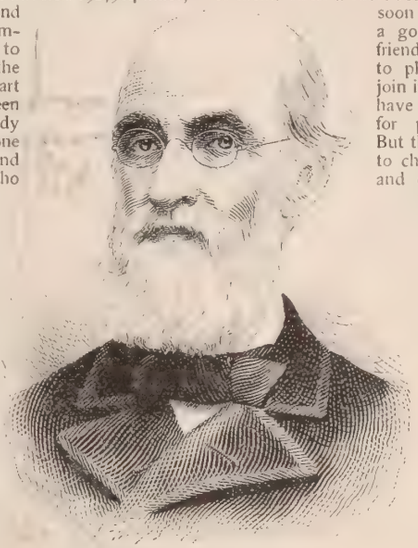
Pioneer Sunday School Missionary Densmore's Life Work Among the Indians and Early Settlers in Michigan—Winning the Red Men by Sacred Song—Hundreds of Schools Planted—Working Amid Perils by Flood, Fire, and Wild Beasts.

FOR sixty-nine years, the American Sunday School Union has been conducting a noble work for Christianity, in establishing and maintaining Sunday Schools in communities where the children have been neglected, and in circulating moral literature. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and especially those among them who have been actively interested in establishing the work of the Rev. G. W. Sharp, our Sunday School missionary in the Southwest, have been made familiar with this special class of missionary labor, through the medium of Mr. Sharp's graphic letters, descriptive of the work in the wild and almost lawless section of the Union in which he operates. To-day we present a chapter from the experience of a remarkable man, who may be truthfully called one of the pioneer Sunday School missionaries of America.

Henry Densmore was born in Ohio in 1822, and moved with his parents to Michigan when that State was a wilderness, occupied by Indians and wild animals. He belonged to a family of giants, being one of six brothers, each of whom was over six feet tall, Henry being six feet four inches. Four sisters were almost as phenomenal in height as the boys. The father and sons farmed while the women spun flax, made all the garments and kept house. They had no schools or churches for a time, but the parents being of Puritan stock they had a Christian home and a Sunday.

In due time a missionary came along and organized a Sunday School, and at the age of sixteen Henry, without a common school education, was chosen Superintendent. His ardent love for children and the help of the missionary gave him great success in the work, so much so that he was urged to enter the service as a missionary of the American Sunday School Union in his own State. This he declined to do, being still too worldly-minded to recognize a divine call in the matter. Some time after, he contracted consumption and soon the doctors told him he had less than three months to live. Then and then only did he decide to devote the balance of his days to the Lord and he was commissioned, but only for a short period, and against the remonstrances of his friends.

The field was 150 miles from home, among the pine forests, where he miraculously revived, and was soon restored to health. He has never left the service, since that hour when he set out, as his friends fully believed, only to die. His record of twenty-five years' work now shows ~~405~~ new Sunday Schools organized, with 1,829 teachers and ~~16,816~~ scholars; 2,414 addresses made, 671 other schools visited and aided, with 12,199 teachers and 171,541 scholars, books to the value of many thousands of dollars sold or distributed among needy schools, thousands of Bibles and Testaments distributed, and nearly 5,000 visits made to families on the field. To accomplish this work, Mr. Densmore has traveled ~~162,914~~ miles, over mountain, forest and river, a distance computed as fully equal to eight times around the world. The greater part of his traveling has been done on a pair of sturdy Indian ponies. He alone now remains of a band of five missionaries, who began work in the Michigan field about the same time, the others having gone to their reward.



MISSIONARY HENRY DENSMORE.

Missionary Densmore, despite his age, and the fact that he has led an unusually active career, is still strong and vigorous, and almost as tall as ever. His snowy hair and beard frame a face that shines with kindness in every feature. While in New York recently, he visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House and recalled some of his more striking experiences.

A SUNDAY SCHOOL PICNIC IN A MAPLE GROVE IN MECOSTA CO., MICH.

"I remember," he said, "when the State of Michigan was nearly all forest. The Indians were more shy of the white men than we were of them. After a short acquaintance, I pretty soon found that a good way to make friends with them was to play with them and join in their sports; they have a great admiration for physical prowess. But the best thing of all to chain their attention and open the way to their hearts was by singing. The Indians love music passionately. I remember, we held a yearly camp-meeting on the Indian Reserve, at which all the Michigan tribes and many from Canada assembled. The camp covered five acres of land and lasted a week. On one occasion, I had been singing until late in the evening, when it was time to retire; the Indians wanted us to keep on. 'Wait until morning,' I urged, and then I went to my tent. About 3 or 4 o'clock, I heard stealthy footsteps, and soon the canvas was pushed aside and a brown face confronted my gaze. There were others behind, and all were intently peering in at me with an expression that might mean something very serious indeed. Jumping up, I asked what was wanted. 'Missionary, come, sing hymn,' said the foremost Indian in a guttural voice that was doubtless meant to be gentle and persuasive. Annoyed as I was, I could not help smiling, for they had been sitting up all

The Tabernacle Pulpit

"CANNOT COME."

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Luke 14: 18, "And they all with one consent began to make excuse."

AFTER the invitations to a levee are sent out, the regrets come in. One man apologizes for non-attendance on one ground, another on another ground. The most of the regrets are founded on prior engagements. So in my text a great banquet was spread, the invitations were circulated, and now the regrets come in. The one gives an agricultural reason, the other a stock-dealer's reason, the other a domestic reason. All poor reasons. The agricultural reason being that the man had bought a farm and wanted to see it. Could he not see it the next day? The stock-dealer's reason being that he had bought five yoke of oxen, and he wanted to go and prove them. He had no business to buy them until he knew what they were. Besides that, a man who can own five yoke of oxen can command his own time. Besides that, he might have yoked two of them together and driven them on the way to the banquet, for locomotion was not as rapid then as now. The man who gave the domestic reason said he had got married. He ought to have taken his wife with him. The fact was, they did not want to go. "And they all with one consent began to make excuse." So now God spreads a great banquet: it is the Gospel feast, and the table reaches across the hemispheres; and the invitations go out and multitudes come and sit down and drink out of the chalices of God's love, while other multitudes decline coming—the one giving this apology and the other giving that apology; "and they all with one consent begin to make excuse." I propose this morning so far as God may help me, to examine the apologies which men make for not entering the Christian life.

Apology the first: I am not sure there is anything valuable in the Christian religion. It is pleaded that there are so many impositions in this day, so many things that seem to be real are sham. A gilded outside may have a hollow inside; there is so much quackery in physics, in ethics, in politics, that men come to the habit of incredulity, and after a while they allow that incredulity to collide with our holy religion.

But, my friends, I think religion has made a pretty good record in the world. How many wounds it has salved, how many pillars of fire it has lifted in the midnight wilderness, how many simoon-struck Saharas it hath turned into the gardens of the Lord; how it hath stilled the chopped sea; what rosy light it hath sent streaming through the rift of the storm-cloud-wrack; what pools of cool water it hath gathered for thirsty Hagar and Ishmael: what manna whiter than coriander seed it hath dropped all around the camp of hardly-bestead pilgrims: what promises it hath sent out like holy watchers to keep the lamps burning around death-beds: through the darkness that lowers into the sepulchre, what flashes of resur-

Besides that, this religion has made so many heroes. It brought Summerfield, the Methodist, across the Atlantic Ocean with his silver trumpet to blow the acceptable year of the Lord, until it seemed as if all our American cities would take the kingdom of heaven by violence. It sent Jehudi Ashman into Africa alone, in a continent of naked barbarians, to lift the standard of civilization and Christianity. It made John Milton among poets, Raphael among painters, Christopher Wren among architects, Thorwaldsen among sculptors, Handel among musicians, Dupont among military commanders; and to give new wings to the imagination, and better balance to the judgment, and more determination to the will, and greater usefulness to the life, and grander nobility to the soul, there is nothing in all the earth like our Christian religion.

Nothing in religion! Why, then, all those Christians were deceived, when in their dying moment they thought they saw the castles of the blessed; and your child, that with unutterable agony you put away into the grave, you will never see him again, nor hear his sweet voice, nor feel the throb of his young heart? There is nothing in religion! Sickness will come upon you. Roll and turn on your pillow. No relief. The medicine may be bitter, the night may be dark, the pain may be sharp. No relief. Christ never comes to the sick-room. Let the pain stab. Let the fever burn. Curse it and die. There is nothing in religion! After awhile, death will come. You will hear the pawing of the pale horse on the threshold. The spirit will be breaking away from the body, and it will take flight—whither? whither? There is no God, no ministering angels to conduct, no Christ, no heaven, no home. Nothing in religion! Oh! you are not willing to adopt such a dismal theory. And yet the world is full of sceptics. And let me say there is no class of people for whom I have a warmer sympathy than for sceptics. We do not know how to treat them. We deride them, we caricature them. We, instead of taking them by the soft hand of Christian love, clutch them with the iron pincers of ecclesiasticism. Oh! if you knew how those men had fallen away from Christianity and become sceptics, you would not be so rough on them. Some were brought up in homes where religion was overdone. The most wretched day in the week was Sunday. Religion was driven into them with a trip-hammer. They had a surfeit of prayer-meetings. They were stuffed and choked with catechisms. They were told by their parents that they were the worst children that ever lived, because they liked to ride down hill better than to read "Pilgrim's Progress." They never heard their parents talk of religion but with the corners of their mouths drawn down and the eyes rolled up. Others went into scepticism through maltreatment on the part of some who professed religion. There is a man who says: "My partner in business was voluble in prayer-meeting; and he was officious in all religious circles; but he cheated me out of three thousand dollars, and I don't want any of that religion."

There are others who got into scepticism by a natural persistence in asking questions, why? or how? How can God be one Being in three persons? They cannot understand it. Neither can I. How can God be a complete sovereign, and yet man a free agent? They cannot understand it. Neither can I. They cannot understand why a holy God lets sin come into the world. Neither can I. They say, "Here is a great mystery; here is a disciple of fashion, frivolous and godless all her days—she lives on to be an octogenarian. Here is a Christian mother training her children for God and for heaven, self-sacrificing, Christ-like, indispensable, seemingly, to that household — she takes the cancer and dies." The sceptic says, "I can't explain that." Neither can I.

Oh! I can see how men reason themselves into scepticism. With burning feet I have trod that blistering way. I know what it is to have a hundred nights poured into one hour. There are men in this audience who would give their thousands of dollars if they could get back to the old religion of their fathers. Such men are not to be caricatured, but helped, and not through their heads, but through their hearts. When these men really do come into the kingdom of God, they will be worth far more to the cause of Christ than those who never examined the evidences of Christianity. Thomas Chalmers once a sceptic, Robert Hall once a sceptic, Christmas Evans once a sceptic; but when they did lay hold of the Gospel chariot, how they made it speed ahead!

If, therefore, I stand this morning, before men and women who have drifted away into scepticism, I throw out no scoff: I rather implead you by the memory of those good old times when you knelt at your mother's knee and said your evening prayer, and those other days of sickness when she watched all night and gave you the medicines at just the right time, and turned the pillow when it was hot, and, with hand long ago turned to dust, soothed your pains, and with that voice you will never hear again unless you join her in the better country, told you never mind—you would be better by and by; and by that dying couch where she talked so slowly, catching her breath between the words—by all those memories I ask you to come and take the same religion. It was good enough for her—it is good enough for you.

Aye, I make a better plea: by the wounds and the death-throe of the Son of God, who approaches you this morning with torn brow and lacerated hands and whipped back, crying: "Come unto me, all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Other persons apologize for not entering the Christian life because of the incorrigibility of their temper. Now, we admit it is harder for some people to become Christians than for others; but the grace of God never came to a mountain that it could not climb, or to an abyss that it could not fathom, or to a bondage that it could not break. The wildest horse that ever trod Arabian sands has been broken to bit and trace. The maddest torrent tumbling from mountain shelving has been harnessed to the mill-wheel and the factory-band, setting a thousand shuttles all a-buzz and a-clatter; and the wildest, the haughtiest, the most ungovernable man ever created, by the grace of God may be subdued and sent out on ministry of kindness, as God sends an August thunder-storm to water the wild flowers down in the grass.

Good resolution, reformatory effort, will not effect the change. It takes a mightier arm and a mightier hand to bend evil habits than the hand that bent the bow of Ulysses, and it takes a stronger lasso than ever held the buffalo on the prairie. A man cannot go forth with any human weapons and contend successfully against these Titans armed with uptorn mountain. But you have known men into whose spirit the influence of the Gospel of Christ came, until their disposition was entirely changed. So it was with two merchants in New York. They were very antagonistic. They had done all they could to injure each other. They were in the same line of business. One of the merchants was converted to God. Having been converted, he asked the Lord to teach him how to bear himself toward that business antagonist, and he was impressed with the fact that it was his duty when a customer asked for a certain kind of goods which he had not, but which he knew his opponent had, to recommend him to go to that store. I suppose that is about the hardest thing the man could do; but being thoroughly converted to God, he resolved to do that very thing, and being asked for a certain kind of goods which he had not, he said: "You go to such and such a store and you will get it." After a while, merchant number two found these customers coming, so sent, and he found also that merchant number one had been brought to God, and he sought the same religion. Now they are good friends and good neighbors, the grace of God entirely changing their disposition.

"O!" says some one, "I have a rough, jagged, impetuous nature, and religion can't do anything for me." Do you know that Martin Luther and Robert Newton and Richard Baxter were impetuous, all-consuming natures, yet the grace of God turned them into the mightiest usefulness? O! how many who have been pugnacious, and hard to please, and irascible, and more bothered about the mote in their neighbor's eye than about the beam like ship-timber in their own eye, have been entirely changed by the grace of God, and have found out that "godliness is profitable for the life that now is as well as for the life which is to come."

Peter, with nature tempestuous as the sea that he once tried to walk, at one look of Christ went out and wept bitterly. Rich harvests of grace may grow on the tip-top of the jagged steep, and flocks of Christian graces may find pasturage in fields of bramble and rock. Though your disposition may be all a-bristle with fretfulness, though you have a temper a-gleam with quick lightnings, though your avarice be like that of the horse-leech, crying: "Give!" though damnable impurities have wrapped you in all-consuming fire — God can drive that devil out of your soul, and over the chaos and the darkness he can say, "Let there be light."

Converting grace has lifted the drunkard from the ditch, and snatched the knife from the hand of the assassin, and the false keys from the burglar, and in the pestiferous lanes of the city met the daughter of sin under the dim lamplight, and scattered her sorrow and her guilt with the words: "Thy sins are forgiven—go, and sin no more." For scarlet sin a scarlet atonement.

Other persons apologize for not entering the Christian life because of the inconsistencies of those who profess religion. There are thousands of poor farmers. They do not know the nature of soil nor the proper rotation of crops. Their corn is shorter in the stalk and smaller in the ear. They have ten less bushels to the acre than their neighbors. But who declines being a farmer because there are so many poor farmers?

There are thousands of incompetent merchants. They buy at the wrong time. They get cheated in the sale of their goods. Every bale of goods is to them a bale of disaster. They fail after awhile and go out of business. But who declines to be a merchant because there are so many incompetent merchants? There are thousands of poor lawyers. They cannot draw a declaration that will stand the test. They cannot recover just damages. They cannot help a defendant escape from the injustice of his persecutors. They are the worst evidence against any case in which they are retained. But who declines to be a lawyer because there are so many incompetent lawyers? Yet there are tens of thousands of people who decline being religious because there are so many unworthy Christians. Now I say it is illogical. Poor lawyers are nothing against jurisprudence, poor physicians are nothing against medicine, poor farmers are nothing against agriculture, and mean, contemptible professors of religion are nothing against our glorious Christianity.

Sometimes you have been riding along on a summer night by a swamp, and you have seen lights that kindled over decayed vegetation—lights which are called Jack-o'lantern or Will-o'-the-wisp. These lights are merely poisonous miasmata. My friends, on your way to heaven you will want a better light than the Will-o'-the-wisps which dance on the rotten character of dead Christians. Exudations from poisonous trees in our neighbor's garden will make a very poor balm for our wounds.

Sickness will come, and we will be pushed out toward the Red Sea which divides this world from the next,and not the inconsistency of Christians, but the rod of faith will wave back the waters as a commander wheels his host. The judgment will come, with its thunder-shod solemnities, attended by bursting mountains and the deep laugh of earthquakes, and suns will fly before the feet of God like sparks from the anvil, and ten thousand burning worlds shall blaze like banners in the track of God omnipotent. Oh! then we will not stop and say, "There was a mean Christian; there was a cowardly Christian; there was a lying Christian; there was an impure Christian." In that day as now, "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; but if thou scornest, thou alone shall bear it." Why, my brother, the inconsistency of Christians, so far from being an argument to keep you away from God, ought to be an argument to drive you to him. The best place for a skilful doctor is in a neighborhood where they are all poor doctors; the best place for an enterprising merchant to open his store is in a place where the bargain-makers do not understand their business; and the best place for you who want to become the illustrious and complete Christian — the best place for you is to come right down among us who are so incompetent and so inconsistent sometimes.

Other persons apologize for not becoming Christians because they lack time. As though religion muddled the brain of the accountant, or tripped the pen of the author, or thickened the tongue of the orator, or weakened the arm of the mechanic, or scattered the briefs of the lawyer, or interrupted the sales of the merchants. They bolt their store doors against it, and fight it back with trowels and with yard-sticks, and cry, "Away with your religion from our store, our office, our factory!"

They do not understand that religion in this workaday world will help you to do anything you ought to do. It can lay a keel, it can sail a ship, it can buy a cargo, it can work a pulley, it can pave a street, it can fit a wristband, it can write a constitution, it can marshal a host. It is as appropriate to the astronomer as his telescope; to the chemist as his laboratory; to the mason as his plumb-line; to the carpenter as his plane; to the child as his marbles; to the grandfather as his staff.

No time to be religious here! You have no time not to be religious. You might as well have no clerks in your store, no books in your library, no compass on your ship, no rifle in the battle, no hat for your head, no coat for your back, no shoes for your feet. Better travel on toward eternity bareheaded and barefooted and homeless and friendless, than to go through life without religion.

Did religion make Raleigh any less of a statesman, or Havelock any less of a soldier, or Grinnell any less of a merchant, or West any less of a painter? Religion is the best security in every bargain, it is the sweetest note in every song, it is the brightest gem in every coronet. No time to be religious! Why, you will have to take time to be sick, to be troubled, to die. Our world is only the wharf from which we are to embark for heaven. No time to secure the friendship of Christ. No time to buy a lamp and trim it for that walk through the darkness which otherwise will be illumined only by the whiteness of the tombstones. No time to educate the eye for heavenly splendors, or the hand for choral harps, or the ear for everlasting songs, or the soul for honor, glory and immortality. One would think we had time for nothing else.

Other persons apologize for not entering the Christian life because it is time enough yet. That is very like those persons who send their regrets and say, "I will come in perhaps at eleven or twelve o'clock; I will not be there at the opening of the banquet, but I will be there at the close." Not yet! Not yet!

Now, I do not give any doleful view of this life; there is nothing in my nature, nothing in the grace of God, that tends toward a doleful view of human life. I have not much sympathy with Addison's description of the "Vision of Mirza," where he represents human life as being a bridge of a hundred arches, and both ends of the bridge covered with clouds,and the race coming on, the most of them falling down through the first span, and all of them falling down through the last span. It is a very dismal picture. I have not much sympathy with the Spanish proverb which says, "The sky is good and the earth is good —that which is bad is between the earth and the sky."

"They all Began to Make Excuse."

But while we as Christian people are bound to take a cheerful view of life, we must also confess that life is a great uncertainty, and that man who says, "I can't become a Christian because there is time enough yet," is running a risk infinite. You do not perhaps realize the fact that this descending grade of sin gets steeper and steeper, and that you are gathering up a rush and velocity which after awhile may not answer to the brakes. O my friends, be not among those who give their whole life to the world and then give their corpse to God. It does not seem fair while our pulses are in full play of health, that we serve ourselves and serve the world, and then make God at last the present of a coffin. It does not seem right that we run our ship from coast to coast carrying cargoes for ourselves, and then when the ship is crushed on the rocks, give to God the shivered timbers. It is a great thing for a man on his dying pillow to repent—better that than never at all; but how much better, how much more generous, it would have been if he had repented fifty years before! My friends, you will never get over these procrastinations.

Here is a delusion. People think, "I can go on in sin and worldliness, but after awhile I will repent, and then it will be as though I had come at the very start." That is a delusion. No one ever gets fully over procrastination. If you give your soul to God some other time than this, you will enter heaven with only half the capacity for enjoyment and knowledge you might have had. There will be heights of blessedness you might have attained, you will never reach; thrones of glory on which you might have been seated, but which you will never climb. We will never get over procrastination, neither in time nor in eternity. We have started on a march from which there is no retreat. The shadows of eternity gather on our pathway. How insignificant is time compared with the vast eternity! I was thinking of this while coming down over the Allegheny Mountains at noon, by that wonderful place which you have all heard described as the Horseshoe—a depression in the side of the mountain where the train almost turns back again upon itself, and you see how appropriate is the description of the "Horseshoe"—and thinking on this very theme, and preparing this very sermon, it seemed to me as if the great courser of eternity speeding along had just struck the mountain with one hoof and gone on into illimitable space. So short is time, compared with the vast eternity!

This morning, voices roll down the sky, and all the worlds of light are ready to rejoice at your disenthralment. Rush not into the presence of the King ragged with sin, when you may have this robe of righteousness. Throw not your crown of life off the battlements. All the scribes of God are this moment ready with volumes of living light to record the news of your soul emancipated.

CHURCH FEDERATION

At a recent meeting of ministers in Boston, Mass., the project of a union or federation between Free Baptists and Congregationalists was discussed. The possibility of such an arrangement being made appeared much stronger than might have been expected.

PREACHING CHRIST IN THE WILDERNESS.

night, waiting for morning, when the promised hymn would be sung, and I suppose their patience had well-nigh been exhausted. I generally got along pleasantly with the Indians. They are exceedingly faithful to a friend and very bitter to an enemy. One old Indian chief told me that the children of his tribe would go through fire and water for their missionary."

Perils from Indians and wild beasts were not the worst dangers that beset the early missionaries in the West. Mr. Densmore can relate thrilling experiences amid the forest fires which in former days were startlingly frequent in the vast pineries of Michigan. These conflagrations levelled the tallest trees and frequently made traveling temporarily impossible. The missionary, hemmed in by fires on either side of a forest path, has seen men and horses crushed into shapeless masses by the falling trees to right and left, while he has been providentially protected. On one occasion his hair and beard were singed while passing through blazing woods. He has been carried down stream while trying to ford a flooded river with his ponies and buggy; been in peril with hunger, thirst, cold and heat, and been menaced by beasts of prey in the wilderness; yet he has come safely and triumphant through it all, with a heart full of gratitude to God for permitting him to be of service among the scattered sheep of the spiritual fold, ten thousand of whom he has gathered in.

Denominationalism plays no part in the work of the American Sunday School Union, which is largely under the charge of laymen,—many of them prominent business men. One Christian sect has no more to do with its work than another Christian sect. It is a union of individual Christians connected with different denominations, and the truths taught are the essentials of Protestant Christianity held in common by all evangelical denominations. The secretaries and missionaries are connected with different denominations and the literature distributed is first sanctioned by a Committee of Publication representing the Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian, Episcopal, Friends, Lutheran and Reformed churches. The missionaries are supported by voluntary contributions from those who have an interest in the moral and religious welfare of the country. They are all picked men of tried Christian character and their work has been for nearly seventy years a potent factor in making America a Christian nation. By bringing in the neglected ones, and organizing them into Sunday Schools they awaken religious interest and pave the way for the success of churches, and stated preaching, and evangelical work generally. These pioneer Union Sunday Schools prepare the way for the denominational enterprises that follow, when the new settlement attains growth and age. They at once unite the scattered settlers and their children in a union of Christian work, in places where separate denominational schools only wither and die. Men like Henry Densmore and George W. Sharp are consecrated soldiers of the Kingdom who carry the Gospel campaign into the "spiritual wastes," and whose watchword is "Christ and Salvation." Through such instrumentality many thousands have been turned away from sin and started on the way that leads to heaven.

Some of the Sunday Schools established by Mr. Densmore are among the largest in the West. Our illustration shows a picnic of one of these schools in a sugar camp of magnificent maple trees in Necosta County, Mich. The aged missionary, who stands at the right of his family, assures us that when the united volume of their fresh young voices ascends in praise through the forest aisles, there can be nothing sweeter this side of heaven!

TOIL AND PATIENCE.

IT is hard to see the crown,
When the Cross before us stands;
It is hard to see the gold,
Glittering 'mid the common sands:
Hard to see the promised goal
When the journey seems so long;
Harder still to find the right,
In the multitude of wrong.

But the things which cost no effort—
These are not the things we prize,
And the soul knows not its power,
'Till it spreads its wings and tries.
'Tis the winning of the medal.
Not the wearing, we enjoy;
As a symbol it is priceless—
Otherwise a childish toy.

WISDOM'S WARNING.

S S. Lesson for April 30 Prov. 1: 20-33. Gold en Text, Heb 12 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE day in which we live is one in which the enemy of souls has succeeded in perverting truth and in turning upside down the true relations between God and man. It is [illegible] intellectual knowledge—possessed by Satan probably in a higher degree than any other created being—should be exalted by man in these days above the fear of God which is the beginning of true wisdom. How few understand that the very highest intellectual development without indwelling God makes men to be only a superior kind of intelligent animal; and that the distinctive mark between him and the animal world is wanting. He is still earthly, his learning is circumscribed by the bounds of this earth, and the astronomical observation which can be taken from this earth. Of God and divine things, of eternity and eternal things, he is as ignorant as the beasts which perish. Intellectual power is a precious gift of God, and may be a blessed instrument in his hands for good; but it is blasphemous assumption, when those who possess it take upon themselves to criticize his word, to dispute his answers to prayer, to reduce both God and our great enemy, to an ideal world, and to exalt man's intellect above him who created it.

If God is God, he must be superior to the works of his hands, and thus the position of the would-be Deists is a false one. The very acknowledging that there is a God who made us, and who rules over the universe, is the claim, that if this God has revealed himself, he should be obeyed and honored, and if not personally known, that he should be sought after until he is found. Solomon, who "was Wiser than all Men,"

(1 Kings 4: 29-31), says that a wise man will hear and will increase in learning; and a man of understanding will attain unto wise counsels, while fools despise wisdom and instruction. The wisdom of which this wise man testified was not shut up in books or learned in universities, "wisdom crieth without, she uttereth her voice in the streets." Even in the busy thoroughfare, amid the maze of people and vehicles, there is a voice speaking for those who have ears to hear, "How long?" This is God's call to man, "How long?" This is man's call to God. (Rev. 6: 10.) Look at the busy throng in the heart of many of our great commercial cities, and mark the faces full of curiosity, the nervous, hurried footsteps, the almost slavish sense of pressure, of drive, of strain, which tells of desperate ventures, of disappointed hopes, of grasping after much, and reaping nothing. No peace, no joy, no satisfaction, none of the quiet solid strength of a conscience at rest in its God to be seen on the most of these faces. How long? How long is all this to go on? Just as long as man shuts God out of his life. It cannot answer, it leads to disappointment, misery, suicide, and a lost eternity, when man lives only for this poor world and for that which it has to give.

By all [illegible] few quiet, still, sunny faces, amidst these miserable ones, telling of our inner life, witnessing to a living God, his wisdom says: "How long?" But far more, and more [illegible] long is all this to go on?" "How long ye [illegible] Turn you at my [illegible] and man's responsibility [illegible] This is God's side [illegible] If man will not turn, [illegible] and according to his own ideas, independently of God's Spirit, it cannot answer, he will only learn his own powerlessness. God holds man responsible for how he treats his advances. There are times in the life of every man when God draws near to him; he knows that an unusual power is seeking to lay hold of, and influence him, he knows he ought to yield. If he does so, God takes possession of him, if he does not, he becomes a God-rejector, and gets more and more hardened. It is an awful thing to trifle with a call from God. With him none can stand on neutral ground: "He that is not with me, is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth." (Matt. 12: 30.) The tables will be turned when their eyes are opened and they see God was in earnest when he sent them this tremendous message: "Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof; I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh. When your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind, when distress and anguish cometh upon you. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer, they shall seek me early but they shall not find me." Trifling with God must have an end. It is the God of love who speaks thus? Does it not sound like revenge?

Oh that men would learn that God is not weak. Longsuffering he is, and "slow to anger," so slow that after warning the generation of men in Noah's time, he waited one hundred and twenty years to see if any would repent and turn from sin! But he is not weak; he cannot ignore sin; he is just and holy, and "will by no means clear the guilty." (Exod. 34: 7.) All the universe must suffer if God allowed man to prevail against him, or sin to prevail against righteousness. God cannot, consistently with his holiness and justice, ignore one single rejection of him on the part of any single sinner. God bears long with guilty men, guilty cities, guilty churches, but things must some day come to a crisis—"the iniquity of the Amorites" was at last "full"—and when things have reached such a pass, mercy becomes unrighteousness.

God gives to every man his choice, no man will be lost through a fatalism which has made salvation impossible to him, the very heathen are judged by a law of conscience; they, too, in their darkness exercise a choice as far as their light goes. (Rom 2: 14-16.) God's plea against those who reject him is: "They hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord. They would none of my counsel, and despised all my reproof. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices." Poor food for an immortal soul, this fruit of his own way! A man has lived for himself, has tried to make men, and things, and even God, revolve around him. Himself was his universe; his measure of all things has been how they touched him, his scale of good and bad how things affected his welfare; men were good or bad in his eyes as they ministered to his prosperity, his honors, his comforts, his amusements. And as to God, he was all very well to worship on Sunday, just as a form because it was respectable; but as to his interfering or taking the central place in his life, as to his asserting his supremacy,—no, such an idea could not for a moment be entertained! And yet the puny created thing who thinks, acts, and speaks thus, was created, and has been held in life moment by moment by this very God whom he treats with the last degree of contempt! Would not creation itself cry out "Shame!" if God were not indignant, and if he did not manifest his just displeasure in dealing with this poor despicable creature as he himself has dealt with a holy God?

"The fruit of their own way," they have chosen it, God has let them have it, "Verily I say unto you: they have their reward": earth instead of heaven. A miserable satisfaction down here in their confined and narrow kingdom of self-love, instead of the glorious exalted joy of ministering to God forever, one with the Most High! They have their desire, but it [illegible] bread, bitterness instead of sweetness, anxiety instead of peace, a lost time, and a lost eternity, instead of an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that "fadeth not away!" Irretrievable loss! This life can be lived only once! God can be rejected only once, and then the God-rejector finds no place of repentance though, like Esau, he seeks it carefully with tears. (Heb. 12: 17.)

"But whoso hearkeneth to me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil." What a contrast, but how true! God's listeners are the happiest people upon earth: fear of evil is unknown to them; in time and in eternity they want nothing but what God wants, and as they are of one mind with him, who disposes of, and overrules all things, both in heaven and earth, fear dies out of their lives. They can see the bright side, the God side, the heaven side of all things, and they live in heaven through the grace of him who died for them while they are yet on earth.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

THE Book of Proverbs, from which this and the next four lessons are taken, is apparently a composite work, the different portions of which belong to different periods. Its main portion consists of 374 miscellaneous proverbs, chiefly in the distich form of a statement and its antithesis, such as (10: 7), "The memory of the just is blessed: but the name of the wicked shall rot." This portion begins at the tenth chapter and extends to the sixteenth verse of the twenty-second chapter. The proverbs apply to a people leading a simple and largely a pastoral life. It is probable that they were spoken by Solomon and recorded by some officer of his court. It would appear that this secretary or reporter was not always present when the wise king was uttering his sayings; for some of them were current in Hezekiah's time, 250 years after Solomon's death, which were not on record. Hezekiah instructed his secretaries to make a collection of them and they were added to the book and form chapters 25-29. Passages of a kindred character but evidently referring to a different condition of society than that of Solomon's day were incorporated under the heading of "words of the wise." There are two of these, one of them beginning 22: 17, and the other consisting of the last twelve verses of the twenty-fourth chapter. Society had degenerated when those were written. It is clear that drunkenness, gluttony and other degrading habits were common. The people, too, appear to have had bad kings and one verse (24: 21) implies that sedition was rife. The literary style is inferior to the main portion and there are words used of foreign origin. The compiler of the book added three appendices probably from foreign sources. One of these, contained in the thirtieth chapter, is ascribed to Agur, and the second (31: 1-9) to Lemuel both of whom are unknown persons. In the last twenty-one verses of the book is a picture of a virtuous woman, the word being used in the sense of vigorous and capable. In the Hebrew it is an acrostic, the verses beginning with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet in their order. To these various sections making up a volume of proverbial philosophy, some writer, probably the compiler of the book wrote an introduction which occupies the first ten chapters. It is clearly of later date than the Solomonic sections and is of a higher moral tone. The writer enjoins righteousness because it is God's command and not because, as in the other sections, it is the best policy. His name is unknown, but he was evidently a man of culture and learning, living not earlier and probably much later than the reign of Josiah. The book has been called the book of divine common sense, and its one supreme lesson, which is presented in many forms, is that goodness is true wisdom and wickedness is utter folly.

Wisdom crieth without . . . in the chief places of concourse. All are invited to listen and to learn. The time is past when a privileged class monopolizes learning and the blessings of religion. In Greece and Italy, while a few superior minds acknowledged a spiritual worship, the common people were kept in brutish ignorance by the celebrated philosophers of Greece and Rome. In Hindostan, though the doctrines of their complicated faith are freely revealed to the Brahmins and their pupils, it is a law never to be violated that the sacred books shall be locked up from the bulk of the people, and the Paria, or lowest caste, is not only excluded from the common assemblies of the people, but forbidden even to enter the temples to pray or to sacrifice. Nay, the Gentoo code even enacts that, should a priest read the sacred books to the inferior orders he shall be put to death by torture.

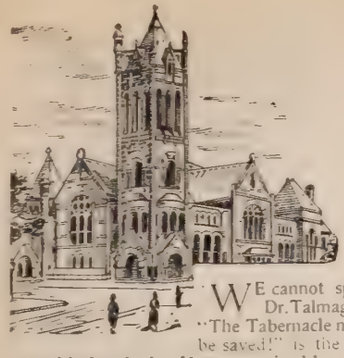
They despised all my reproof. When Moscow was burning, there was a party dancing right over a gunpowder magazine. They did not know the full extent of their danger, so the leader of the festivity shouted, "One dance more!" A messenger entered to tell them how extensive was the fire, but the leader would not listen. Then another messenger came to tell them of the quantity of gunpowder below, but merriment reigned through the palace, and the cry was "One dance more!" and the music played, and the feet bounded, and the laughter rang out; but suddenly, through the fire and the smoke and the thunder of the explosion, eternity broke.

Because I have called and ye refused. The steamship Central America, on a voyage from New York to San Francisco, sprung a leak in mid-ocean. A vessel seeing her signal of distress, bore down toward her. Perceiving the danger to be imminent, the captain of the rescue ship spoke to the Central America. "What is amiss?" "We are in bad repair; lie by till morning," was the answer. "Let me take your passengers on board now." But the captain of the Central America thinking the damage might be repaired, replied, "Lie by till morning." Once again the captain of the rescue ship called, "You had better let me take them on now." "Lie by till morning," was sounded back through the trumpet. About an hour and a half later her lights were missed; and though no sound was heard, the Central America had gone down and all on board perished.

They shall eat of the fruit of their own way. It is surprising how often the evildoer is detected and punished in spite of his sagacity and his cleverly planned schemes. Punishment frequently falls, too, on a man who has reformed. A case occurred some years ago in Alabama of a murder of an inoffensive citizen. The murderer made his escape and determined to commit no more crime. He fled to Arkansas, took an assumed name, married an estimable woman, and settled down to the life of an examplary and respected citizen. The neighbors held him in high esteem, and no shadow of the crime ever fell across the threshold of his home during ten years, but at the end of the time some one from Alabama saw and recognized him. A few days afterward an Alabama sheriff arrived, arrested him, and carried him back to the scene of his former murder to pay the penalty of the crime which, he hoped, was busied in oblivion.

It is told of Hercules that he shot his enemy Nessus with a poisoned arrow, and the garment of the slain man was all stained with poisoned blood. Before he died, Nessus gave his clothing to the wife of Hercules, telling her that it would make her husband love her always. After a time she gave the fatal garment to her husband, and no sooner had he put it on than the poison seized upon him, and when in his agony, he tried to pull off the clothing it clung all the tighter, and so he died, killed by his own poison.

The prosperity of fools shall destroy them. "I have seen," says a famous writer, "a tree borne down and broken by the weight of its fruit. I remember, too, seeing a fine sheep lying dead in a field. The shepherd told me that it had been killed by a strange dog. The other sheep in the flock got safely away, through a hole in the hedge, but this fellow was so fat and had had so much wool on him that he could not get through and the dog caught him. He might have been alive, then, said I if he had not had so much wool. I once knew a poor maimed soldier who suffered in the same way. He lost both his legs in a skirmish in the war. He was one of a party which had seized some plunder. The enemy came upon them unexpectedly, but all got away safely save this man, who had secured a larger share than the others and being loaded down with it fell into the rear and was shot by the pursuers. He might have kept his legs if he had not been so intent on keeping his riches. Mind you never get into a state in which it may be said of you 'he might not have lost his soul if he had been willing to part with his money.'" In the ruins of Pompeii there was a petrified woman, who, instead of flying from the doomed city, had spent her time in gathering up her jewels. She saved neither her life nor her jewels. There are multitudes making the same mistake. In trying to get earth and heaven they lose both.



Dr. Talmage's Appeal Not in Vain.

"We Cannot Let the Tabernacle Go Under," is the Universal Answer to His Call for Help—The Tide of Sympathy Rising—The Emergency Fund Growing and more Contributions Still Coming in—Some of the Letters.

"We cannot spare Dr. Talmage!" "The Tabernacle must be saved!" is the cry echoed in hundreds of letters received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past week. Very many of these letters contain offerings to the Emergency Fund, and all breathe courage and hope that the great temple of Christianity may be saved from desecration, and that its pulpit, hallowed by so many sacred memories, may never be profaned by being converted into a theatre.

Dr. Talmage's appeal outlined in brief but realistic sentences, the present situation with regard to the Tabernacle. In addressing the hundreds of thousands who read his sermons in these columns, he employed no subterfuges of diction and kept nothing back. He did as he always does—took his people into his confidence, believing that they would not consent that his pastorate—which is in the highest sense a national one, and not confined to any particular city—should be imperilled for lack of financial support in an emergency like that which now confronts it.

To how many godly men and women in America has he been, in the passing years, the guide, philosopher and friend! What crowds of strangers, from every part of the United States, have sat in the Tabernacle, week after week, to listen to those wonderful sermons, that are an inspiration to mankind! Indeed, he has been peculiarly the "pastor of the strangers." The great Tabernacle was built on its present generous proportions with a special view to their accommodation, and strangers have always constituted a considerable part of its audiences. In building on so extensive a scale, the trustees had no thought other than to accommodate those who came knocking at the Tabernacle gates. And they were never turned away.

There is to-day not a city or town, hardly even a village, in the United States where the Tabernacle Pulpit is unknown, and in which its eloquent pastor has not some who are included among his audiences. His sermons, everywhere read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have for many years been a mighty spiritual influence, and it is not surprising that his scattered flock in distant states should have vied with those near at hand in coming cheerfully and gladly to his aid in the present troubles. Some of the extracts from their letters which we print on this page, show rare self-denial and devotion to the cause of Christianity, and all give evidence of the pervading spirit of Christian helpfulness which blesses both the giver and the gift. In the past, this same devotion to good works has led the readers of this journal into many avenues of Christian usefulness and made them instrumental in the accomplishment of much good. Their philanthropies have spread across oceans and into many lands. They supported a Christian missionary in Korea; substantially aided mission work among the Tamils and Teleguse in Ceylon; bountifully fed many sufferers during the Irish famine; strengthened Protestant missions in Mexico, and materially aided others in the South American States. For nearly two years they have supported a Sunday School missionary in the Southwest, where he is doing grand work in extending Sunday Schools in the neglected districts. They helped to found an independent missionary work at Tokio, Japan, and for three years they supported a Christian minister and his wife in a most effective missionary work among the redmen, in the district around McAlester, Indian Territory. They generously upheld a Baptist Church in Pennsylvania, through a crisis caused by a mining fire, when otherwise the church must have gone down. They have aided with their prayers and their substance many worthy movements in the home missionary field for the reclamation of the wanderers from the fold, and they have held out the open hand of brotherhood and succor to the poor negroes of the South, helping to build up substantially their colleges and schools in Florida, Louisiana, the Carolinas and elsewhere. The crowning acts of self-sacrifice last year, when they sent nearly $40,000 worth of breadstuffs to Russia and a supply of food and clothing to the flood sufferers in our own Southwestern States, are too well remembered to need to be recalled now. It is a splendid record, and one probably without a parallel, even in Christian America. The prompt and gracious response to Dr. Talmage's appeal in the present case shows that the zeal for good works has nowise abated and that we did not err in believing that our readers would make the question of saving the Tabernacle a matter of prayer and conscientious action, as they now seem resolved to do. These extracts from their letters show it:

J. W. Schantle, Vinton, Ia., $1. "We cannot let the church go under."

Mrs. E. A. Evans, Dayton, O., $5. "With my prayers for the Brooklyn Tabernacle."

Mrs. K. Page, LaSalle, Ill., $1.00. "I only wish I could place the decimal point farther to the right."

Subscriber, Brockton, Mass., $5. "May the liberal response be as spontaneous as was the Russian Famine Fund."

C. S. Riday, Philadelphia, Pa., $1. "I hope and pray you may receive enough to save the church for the Lord."

Henry J. Adams, Treasurer, Brooklyn, N. Y., $25. "I give it cheerfully toward the payment of the debt of the Tabernacle."

"In His Name," Columbus, Ind., $1.00. "I am going to pray God to open the hearts of the people that the great church may be saved."

Ruth F. Aldrich, Greenville, R. I., $1. "A small offering from a helpless cripple. I cannot afford to lose my weekly sermon in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

George W. D. Nangle, Soldiers and Sailors Home, Quincy, Wis., $1. "I am poor and an invalid soldier, but my heart is touched by such an earnest appeal."

Maria B. and Sarah Stilwell, New Paltz, N. Y., $2. "We are poor sewing girls and would give much more if we could. The Lord will not let his church go for a theatre."

Mr. W. S. Hitt and wife, Middlebury, Pa., $5., write: "I hope all the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may do likewise. Oh, may it be God's good pleasure to save the church through his people."

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Morse, Butte City, Mont. "We enjoy reading your sermons so much, that we feel we ought to contribute our mite towards so worthy an object. May you continue in the good work you are now doing."

Alice Ames, Jefferson, Me., $1. "It is the widow's mite and all I can send. I wish it was more. I trust with God's help many dollars will be sent until the Tabernacle debt will be paid. He surely will bless those who labor for him."

N. E. Arnold, Middleport, O. "We are all interested in you and your grand and noble work. 'The statutes of the Lord are right,' and he will see that his places of worship are cared for. May God aid you and reward you, is my prayer."

"A Widow," New York., $1 50. "It comes with an earnest prayer that the Church may 'come out of the fire' purified, and that that man of God may be strengthened for the great work he has to do. If one-half of your subscribers would do the same, it would help the servant of God to carry a burden which is too heavy for mortal man. I myself am in circumstances needing help; but there is that scattereth and yet increaseth."

Frederick N. Cook, Boundbrook, N. J., $14.45. "This is a thank offering from the members of a little mission school at Chimney Rock; the people are all poor and have a hard time; but when they learned that your church was in need, gladly went about to render what assistance they could. Our school was established by Mr. John Talmage. Each gladly gave what they could, in order that Dr. Talmage and the Tabernacle might not be parted."

Rev. Mr. Oakes, the assistant Pastor of the Tabernacle, informs THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the creditors of the Tabernacle have decided to defer extreme measures until the result of this appeal is definitely known. If successful the church will be saved; if not it will be sold. In the latter case, every dollar of the Emergency Fund will be returned to the senders. This will be welcome news to all who desire to subscribe, but want some assurance that the object of their subscription will be actually accomplished.

The Sessions Family Heard From.

Nathan Albert Sessions, the Adopted Son, Dies on the Congo—An Afflicted Missionary Household—Mr Sessions also Sick

NEWS has been received from the Congo, announcing the death by fever of Nathan Albert Sessions, the adopted son of George W. and Alice Sessions, who last year started out to found an independent, self-supporting mission in Africa. Nathan was the real leader of the party, which consisted of

THE LATE N. W. SESSIONS.
Died in Africa January 15, 1893.

Mr. and Mrs. Sessions, Mary and Howard, their children and Myrtle Irene Perry, a neice. For several years the missionary spirit had been growing in the little household, which was formerly at Correctionville, Ia., where the Sessions owned a comfortable homestead. It was finally decided to sell the place and on Washington's birthday, 1892, the family set their faces toward Africa. For many months no word came from them. The story of their consecration and the journey they had undertaken, which was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the time, awakened a widespread interest and many letters have been received inquiring about their welfare. To-day we are enabled through the courtesy of Bishop Taylor's mission, to lay before our readers extracts from letters received from Bethel Mission, the name of the station founded by the Sessions at Catella, Congo.

Writing under date of December 23, 1892, young Nathan Webb states that the entire party was in good spirits. With the exception of Howard, who had a slight attack of fever, All were then well. On May 30, 1892, after much difficulty a location was chosen and work begun on mission buildings, and these were fairly finished by October 1. Gospel and farm work were also begun and the outlook was promising. By the same mail came a letter from Mrs. Sessions dated January 10, 1893, telling of the sickness and death of Nathan, who was taken with a chill on January, and died on the 15th. Mr. Sessions was sick of fever at the time of writing.

In his letter written while still in good health and working hopefully at the mission, young Nathan said: "We have had four hours of school each day since the 25th of October (teaching the natives and the younger members of the family). We are much encouraged with our progress and feel that with five already in our school being trained for missionaries, we can truly sing with the Congo Band of New York City: 'We're bound to take the Congo for Jesus.' We have religious services each day with the laborers, through our interpreter, but as yet are not able to do much spiritually among this people."

HABIT A TASKMASTER

HABIT is a taskmaster; as long as we obey it, it does not chastise us; but let us resist and we find we are to be lashed with scorpion-whips and bound with ship-cable, and thrown into the track of bone-breaking Juggernauts! During the war of 1812 there was a ship set on fire just above Niagara Falls, and then,cut loose from its moorings,it came on down through the night and tossed over the Falls. It was said to have been a scene brilliant beyond description. Well there are thousands of men on fire of evil habit, coming down through the rapids and through the awful night of temptation toward the eternal plunge. Oh ! how hard it is to arrest them. God only can arrest them.

Suppose a man after five, or ten, or twenty years of evil-doing,resolves to do right ? Why, all the forces of darkness are allied against him. He cannot sleep nights. He gets down on his knees in the midnight and cries, "God help me !" He bites his lip. He grinds his teeth. He clenches his fist in a determination to keep his purpose. He dare not look at the bottles in the window of a wine-store. It is one long, bitter, exhaustive, hand-to-hand fight with inflamed, tantalizing, and merciless habit.

When he thinks he is entirely free, the old inclinations pounce upon him like a pack of hounds with their muzzles tearing away at the flanks of one poor reindeer. In Paris there is a sculptured representation of Bacchus, the god of revelry. He is riding on a panther at full leap. Oh, how suggestive ! Let every one who is speeding on bad ways understand he is not riding a docile and well-broken steed, but he is riding a monster, wild and bloodthirsty, going at a death-leap.

THE HEAVEN OF THE SCEPTIC

I HAVE not heard yet one single intelligent account of the future world from anybody who does not believe in the Bible. They throw such a fog about the subject that I do not want to go to the sceptic's heaven, to the transcendentalist's heaven, to the worldly philosopher's heaven. I would not exchange the poorest room in your house for the finest heaven that Huxley or Stuart Mill or Darwin ever dreamed of. Their heaven has no Christ in it; and a heaven without Christ, though you could sweep the whole universe into it, would be no heaven. Oh, they tell us there are no songs there; there are no coronations in heaven. But that would not satisfy me.

Give me Christ and my old friends—that is the heaven I want, that is heaven enough for me. O garden of light,whose leaves never wither, and whose fruits never fail ! O banquet of God, whose sweetness never palls the taste and whose guests are kings forever ! O city of light, whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are praise ! O palace of rest,where God is the monarch and everlasting ages the length of his reign !

When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold ?
Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold.

GIVING A LIFT.

EVERY man wants help. Tens of thousands of people trudge on in life with no one to address them a cheering word. There are those who scold at them, cry over them, groan about them; but as to any exhilarant sympathy, these weary ones get none of it. Now, there is help for every one, if he only knows where and how to get it. Go away from us,with your croaking and snuffling, and give us a few robust words of joyous inspiration !

There are some days when there comes with unusual impressiveness upon our mind the fact that this world is a most insufficient portion, and that we must have something better than is here afforded. If we should go among our readers and ask the question (and you were frank in responding to it) : "What is the great want of your life ? " one would give this and another would give that. One would say: "It is restored physical health I want." Another would say : "It is more clearness of mental power that I want." Another would say: "It is more worldly means that I want."

Another would say: "It is better social position that I want." There would be others who would make no reply at all, for they have in their soul an indefinite longing for something, they know not what, and if they have not been able to define it to their own soul they certainly would not be able to define it to any human ear. But you have all made a mistake in this reply, unless you have said within yourself: "My great want is Jesus Christ. If I possess him already in my heart, I want more of him—more of his light, more of his love, more of his pardon, more of his salvation."

PRAY AND DIG.

GOD is infinite in resource. When the city of Rochelle was besieged, and the inhabitants were dying of the famine, the tide washed up on the beach as never before, and has never since, enough shell-fish to feed the whole city. God is good. There is no mistake about that. History tells us that,in 1555, in England, there was a great drought. The crops failed, but in Essex, on the rocks, in a place where they had neither sown nor cultured, a great crop of peas grew, until they filled a hundred measures; and there were blossoming vines enough promising much more.

But why go so far ? I can give you a family incident. I will tell you a secret that has never been told. Some generations back there was a great drought in Connecticut, New England. The water disappeared from the hills and the farmers living on the hills drove their cattle down toward the valleys, and had them supplied at the wells and fountains of the neighbors. But these after awhile began to fail, and the neighbors said to Mr. Birdseye, "You must not send your herds here any more; our wells are giving out." Mr. Birdseye, the old Christian man, gathed his family at the altar, and with his family he gathered the slaves of the household—for bondage was then in vogue in Connecticut—and on their knees before God they cried for water; and the family story is, that there was weeping and great sobbing at that altar, that the herds and flocks might not perish. The family rose from the altar. Mr. Birdseye, the old man, took his staff and walked out over the hills, and in a place where he had been scores of times without noticing anything particular, he saw the ground was very dark, and he took his staff, and turned up the ground, and the water started; and he beckoned to his servants and they came, and they brought pails and buckets until all the family, and all the flocks and the herds, were cared for, and then they made troughs reaching from that place down to the house and barn, and the water flowed, and it is a living fountain to-day ! Now, I call that old grandfather, Elijah, and I call that brook that began to roll then, and is rolling still, the brook Cherith; and the lesson to me, and to all who hear it, is, when you are in great stress of circumstances, pray and dig, dig and pray, and pray and dig. How does that passage go ?—"The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my loving kindness shall not fail." If your merchandise, if your mechanism, fail, look out for the ravens. If you have, in your despondency, put God on trial, and condemned him as guilty of cruelty, I move, this morning for a new trial. If the biography of your life is ever written, I will tell you what the first chapter, and the middle chapter, and the last chapter will be about if it is written accurately. The first about mercy, the middle chapter about mercy, the last chapter about mercy. The mercy that hovered over your cradle. The mercy that will hover over your grave.

SIN CANNOT BE HID.

YOU cannot keep an iniquity quiet. At just the wrong time the sheep will bleat and the oxen will bellow. Achan cannot steal the Babylonish garment without getting stoned to death, nor Benedict Arnold betray his country without having his neck stretched. Look over the police arrests, these thieves, these burglars, these counterfeiters,these highwaymen, these assassins. They all thought they could bury their iniquity so deep down that it would never come to resurrection. But there was some shoe that answered to the print in the sand, some false keys found in possesssion, some bloody knife that whispered of the deed, and the public indignation, and the anathema of outraged law hurled him into the Tombs or hoisted him on the gallows.

At the close of the battle between the Dauphin of France and the Helvetians, Burchard Monk was so elated with the victory that he lifted his helmet to look off upon the field, when a wounded soldier hurled a stone that struck his uncovered forehead and he fell. Sin always leaves some point exposed; there is no safety in iniquity.

Francis the First, King of France,was discussing how it was best to get his army into Italy. Amaril, the court fool, sprang out from the corner and said to the king and his staff-officers: "You had better be thinking how you will get your army back out of Italy after once you have entered." In other words, it is easier for us to get into sin than to get out of it. Do not think that you can hide any great and protracted sin in your hearts. In an unguarded moment it will slip off the lip, or some slight occasion may for a moment set ajar this door of hell that you wanted to keep closed. But suppose that in this life you hide it, and you get along with that transgression burning in your heart, as a ship on fire within for days may hinder the flame from bursting out by keeping down the hatchways, yet at last, in the judgment, that iniquity will blaze out before God and the universe.

On the day when the coffin goes out of the front door, and down the front steps, it leaves a house very lonesome if there be no Bible on the stand and no Christ to stand at the desolated hearth-stone.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

HOW TO HELP HIM.

I MEAN your preacher. You can help him by a recognition that he is yet human and susceptible to the ordinary influences which touch human nature. Pinch him, and it hurts; say mean things, and he will feel it like any other mortal; starve him, and you will make him weigh less: and keep it up and you will hold a funeral. Pay him so he has to buy skimmed milk, and you will know it in his sermons. Talk about his wife and children whom he loves, and with all his grace, be sure he will get mad. I don't mean wickedly mad, but righteously so.

To help him, don't do any of these things. To increase the power of his sermons, try an increase in salary. To get him to be more sociable, try to entertain him a little better. To get him to call oftener, ring the parsonage door-bell more frequently. To get more gems of thought, give him some, in the shape of books, etc. To hear some other preacher, give him money to get a good supply now and then. These are a few of the "helps" which can come from pew to pulpit.

A Good Sexton.

I heard a minister of the Gospel tell in a meeting the other day of the mercies of God in the shape of "a good sexton." No small mercy that: to get a man who can keep the house of the Lord clean, and give the right temperature, keeping doors from squeaking, windows from rattling, drafts from blowing, and a score and more of other necessary things essential to a good service, is no small thing, I tell you.

But good sextons are made, not born; and they are made by other means then slaps, and thrusts, and faultfindings,and cross looks, and crosser words. Two things, yea three, will produce the man, either male or female. First: Good instruction as to what is wanted. Second: Good pay for the work done Third: Open recognition of faithful service. I might add a fourth, and that is: proper facilities and helps for doing the work. You can't wash a window with a coal scoop, or dust the pulpit with a broom; neither can you expect the sexton to keep the church cool with the meacury up to ninety-five. A congregation needs sense, as well as the sexton.

Unproven Promises.

A PROMISE is of no account till put to the test. This is true of God's promises just as much as those of men. Here is a man who says, "I will help you"; now it's when I am in trouble I go to him, and ask him to stand by his promise, and he does and I get help. Then I realize the meaning of his words. So with the many promises of God recorded in the Bible: they are only good or of real value when proven.

Take the promise of guidance in Psalm 32: 8. There are now tens of thousands who know not which way to turn or what to do. Some in mental distress, others in spiritual want, others in business difficulty,many more in the "battle for bread find the war they wage going against them. All of these in sad need of help as to what they shall do. And here is a promise God is only too glad to fulfill to all of these and more, if they will only put the weight of their absolute trust in him, to do what he has said.

Maybe my reader will say, "I'm one of them, I need guidance." Well ! let me help you; don't quibble or quabble with Bible expositors, but you just turn to that promise, kneel down, and tell the Mighty One you want him to prove that true to you now, and as sure as two and two make four, he will do it. And then the fact of a proven promise in your mind will do more to counteract the tendency to doubt and scepticism than a thousand sermons, be they the very best.

Don't Want a Resurrection.

THERE are some graves I hope will never be opened. Never. I don't want the trumpet to sound, nor God to speak, that will bring forth in any shape the following, which I have buried; buried, I hope, forever.

1st. Old grudges against people.
2d. Sins of omission and commission.
3d. Mean looks and meaner acts.
4th. Unholy aspirations, and,
5th. False judgments.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

INTERNATIONAL LITIGANTS.

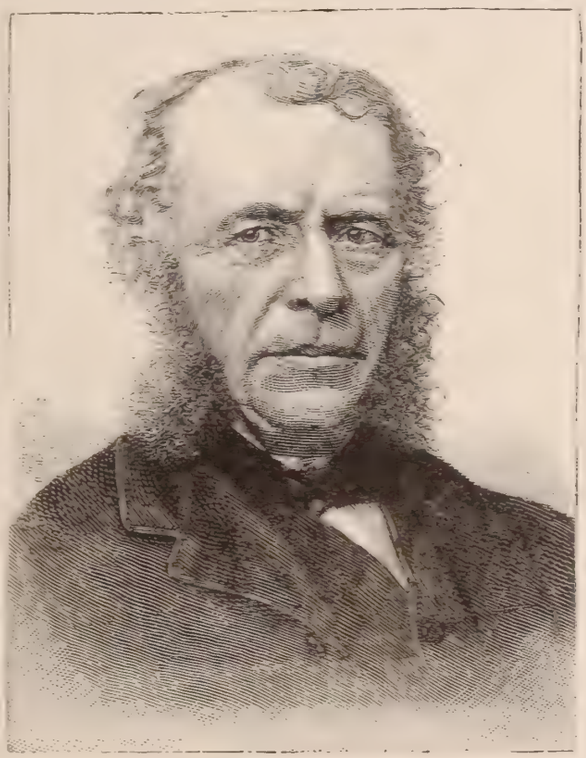
AN opportunity for the display of legal skill was afforded at the sitting of the Court of Arbitration in Paris on April 4. The Court is appointed to decide the points of dispute between our Government and that of England, relative to the respective rights of the two nationalities in Behring Sea. This was the first business sitting of the Court which met by adjournment from March 24. It was somewhat unfortunate that at the very opening of the proceedings, there was an exchange of personalities and an acrimonious dispute between the legal gentlemen employed, such as frequently occurs in our courts of law. It arose out of the proposal of the English counsel to introduce evidence, which the American counsel contended was inadmissible at that stage of the case. It referred to the method of conducting the seal fisheries on the islands and in the open sea. Our counsel argued that if the decision of the court was against the United States, on the claim for exclusive jurisdiction in the sea, then a treaty would be necessary by which the United States and England should arrange measures for the protection of the seals from poachers. Then the evidence as to the methods of sealing would be pertinent, but if the court should decide that the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, no treaty would be necessary and the evidence would not be required. This question was argued with considerable asperity, and Sir Charles Russell on the English side, and Mr. E. J. Phelps on the American side dispensed with the courtesy toward each other which is generally maintained in international disputes. If Mr. Phelps's contention is correct, it is not surprising that he lost patience with his antagonist. It is absurd to waste time in discussing the details of a condition which may never arise. It is, however, a common disposition, and is often met with by ministers of the Gospel. Men are often eager in the discussion of the mysteries of the future state and the locality and occupations of heaven when they should be intent on the practical question of securing their own entrance to that state through Christ. (1. Timothy 1: 4.)

A Pre-Historic Wall.

THE discovery in Texas of an ancient wall has been reported to one of the scientific departments of the Government. A correspondent of the St. Louis Republic, who has examined the marvelous ruin, writes that it is nearly twenty miles in length, and from ten to fifteen feet high, and as many feet thick. It passes through Milano, and runs north-east and south-west from that point. It is now almost entirely underground, being probably buried under the ruins of its upper portions. Inscriptions have been found on its face in several parts, but they are in an unknown character and will probably never be deciphered. It is the general belief that it must have been built by the Aztecs, seven or eight hundred years ago, if not by the Toltecs, who preceded them. It is known that a large Aztec population occupied the district about that period, and that they had attained a high civilization. Remains of their temples have been discovered, which show remarkable beauty of architecture. One of them, the ruins of which are on a high hill near Milano, had two hundred lofty pillars, made of hard baked clay. Fragments of idols have also been found in the neighborhood, and evidences that animals were offered in sacrifice to them. It is thought that human sacrifices were also offered. That these people built the newly discovered wall is highly probable. It may have served as a boundary and a protection against attacks of the enemy, like the great wall of China, which it closely resembles in construction and extent. But its purpose, its builders and all connected with it, are matters of conjecture. The fact is significant. Although these people were capable of erecting edifices so beautiful that their ruins fill us with wonder and admiration, we know scarcely anything of the people themselves. It is not by those achievements which we are in the habit of calling permanent, that the memory of a nation is most surely perpetuated. While the scholars who are familiar with the history and character of the people who built the Pyramids, and even the Parthenon and Coliseum, are comparatively few, there are millions who are familiar with the history of the Jews, a people who left no notable architectural memento of their existence. Even in this world, "The things which are seen are temporal, but those which are unseen are eternal" (II. Cor. 4: 18.)

Homeless in his Home.

A SAD history was brought to light in Brooklyn, N. Y., a few days ago, by the discovery of the dead body of a homeless tramp, in a vacant house. The house has been empty for two years and during that time has often been occupied at night by vagrants, who happened to know how to get into it. It had seen better days. It was once the property of a wealthy young man named Fagan, who, on inheriting his wealth, began there a career of dissipation. The walls had echoed with the songs and laughter of many an orgie, when Fagan and his friends held revelry there. But the money was soon spent and the friends scattered. The house was sold and the new owner lived in it. Misfortune came upon him; his wife went crazy and was sent to an asylum and soon afterward he died. No one troubled to keep the house in repair, or to obtain new tenants for it. It stood vacant, except for the vagrants before mentioned, who secretly used it for a free sleeping-place. When the police were informed, the other day, that there was a dead body in one of the rooms, they made a search and found the corpse in tattered clothes huddled in a corner. Evidently it was that of a homeless tramp who had sought a shelter to die in. The residents of the neighborhood went to look at the body as it lay awaiting removal to the morgue and they identified it. Death had brought back to the seamed and grimy face, as it often does, the expression of youth and they knew the man for the once wealthy Fagan who had owned the house into which he had crawled to die. His returning in his poverty and misery, like the Prodigal, to the home of his youth was very pathetic and it was sad that he should have found there only desolation. It is a pity that no one was with him then to point him to a heavenly home where a loving Father waits to forgive and welcome repentant prodigals. (Hosea 14: 4.)



HON. E. J. PHELPS, U. S. COUNSEL IN THE BEHRING SEA CASE.

A Family Claim.

THERE is a curious history connected with an application for office which has been recently sent to the President from a town in Texas. The Post-office in that town was held, according to the story published in the Galveston News, by a Republican who died during President Arthur's administration. His widow was appointed Postmistress, and the duties of the office were performed by her daughter's husband. He declared himself a Democrat, and when the new administration came in he applied for the office and was appointed. He lost it when Mr. Wanamaker was wielding the axe, but his mother-in-law put in her claim as the widow of a Republican and a former office-holder. She obtained the appointment and her son-in-law continued his duties. Now that there is another change in the administration the son-in-law has applied for the office, and the News says he has indorsements to his application that will insure its success. When there are differences in politics in a family there is generally estrangement, but in this case the difference seems to have worked to the general advantage, enabling the same man to continue his employment under both the rival parties. There are some who are trying to make the best of both worlds as this man is making the best out of both political parties, but the attempt never succeeds. Neither by family connection nor church relations can any man secure an inheritance in Christ's kingdom. The glory of the throne is for those only who have borne the cross (Luke 14: 27.)

A Dog Saves a Life.

A REMARKABLE evidence of a dog's intelligence is contained in a report in the Daily Mail of Toronto. It states that the previous night a man living a few miles out of Tottenham, near the railroad track, was aroused in the night by the barking of a dog. He drove him away, but he returned and resumed his howling and scratching at the door. Finally, for the sake of peace, the man, supposing the dog wanted a shelter from the storm, went down and opened the door to him. But the dog did not want to come in; he wanted the man to come out, and he showed it as plainly as he could by running a short distance and waiting for the man to follow. Very reluctantly the man dressed and went out, feeling sure that there must be some reason for the dog's strange actions. Following the dog, he came to a dark object lying across the track, which he found to be the body of a man. He dragged the unconscious form away, only a few minutes before a train came thundering over the place. He must have been lying in his perilous position nearly two hours. The dog must have seen him and perceiving his danger, gone to the nearest house for help. But for his sagacity the man would have been killed. We are accustomed to take credit for superiority to the brute creation, but it would be difficult to define the grounds for the claim in a case like this. The dog, with such faculties as he possessed, perceived that a stranger was in peril and took the best measures for saving him. It is not always that men show similar concern and are equally in earnest for the rescue, in cases where not only life here, but life throughout eternity is in peril. (Gen. 4: 9.)

Signed Without Reading.

AN impressive proof of respect and confidence in the learning and ability of a judge was given recently in the State of Maine. An eminent judge of another State was visiting one of the justices of the Maine Supreme Court. The two jurists were sitting in the library discussing a complicated case which was then pending in the Supreme Court when a messenger entered and handed a package to the Maine justice. He opened it and remarked to his friend, this is Judge Walton's judgment on that case. They were both interested in the decision, but before reading it, the Maine justice took up a pen to affix his signature to the document. "You surely are not going to sign that opinion before you have read it?" said his friend. "Certainly I am," was the reply. "This, as you know, is a complicated case, involving intricate questions of law. Now Justice Walton knows law and I know him. I am sure that whatever decision he has arrived at is right. I am as sure before I read it that I am right in endorsing it, as I shall be after I have read it," and he wrote his signature across the decision and then proceeded to read the opinion he had signed. If men habitually exercised the same confidence in God's wisdom in the affairs of life as this judge displayed in his brother justice they would be spared much worry and anxiety. (Psalms 19: 8.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Major Whittle has been much blessed in the services he held in Edinburgh. Queen Street Free Presbyterian Church was crowded.

Christ Church, New York, celebrated last week the one hundredth anniversary of its foundation. Next to old Trinity, it is the oldest Protestant Episcopal Church in the city.

The arrangements for Mr. Moody's meetings in Chicago during the fair have been completed. Preparations have been made to hold meetings in every part of the city each night beginning with May 1.

Dr. L. W. Munhall commenced services at Ypsilanti, Mich., immediately on the close of the series of meetings at Muscatine, Iowa. Recent reports indicate that the deep feeling and blessed results of the Muscatine work will be duplicated at Ypsilanti.

Rev. Arthur J. Smith, who formerly assisted Dr. Chapman at Bethany Church, Philadelphia, has been conducting revival services at Millvale, Pa., with much success. Very large audiences gathered at every meeting, and over four hundred pledge cards were signed.

Dr. Samuel Cox, the eminent English Baptist minister, died on March 27. Dr. Cox was well known in this country by his volume on "The Quest of the Chief Good," and other expository works. He was one of the most brilliant theologians in the Baptist denomination in England.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church mourns the death of her favorite bishop, John M. Brown. He was seventy-six years of age and had been twenty-five years a bishop. He had seen much trouble and persecution and had more than once been in prison for the sake of his principles.

As the first fruits of the meetings recently held in Springfield, O., by Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, fifty-four persons joined the First Church, forty of these from the Sunday School. Fifteen joined the Lagonda Avenue Church, and more are expected to join both churches at the next communion.

The death of the Rt. Rev. William I. Kip, Bishop of California, took place on April 6. Dr. Kip was eighty-two years of age and had been Bishop of California forty years. He was the author of many famous works which have had a wide circulation, among which were: "The Early Conflicts of Christianity," "Unnoticed Things of Scripture" and "The Church of the Apostles."

The Sunday School Exhibition Building in connection with the World's Fair will be located just outside the Exposition grounds. Four prizes have been awarded to the competitors who sent in plans for the building. The Sunday Schools of Chicago and friends of the movement have pledged $30,000 toward the expenses and an appeal has been sent to other schools for help to defray the balance. Mr. B. F. Jacobs has made himself personally responsible for the amount demanded.

The burning of the College at Marsovan, in Armenia, of which an account recently appeared in this journal, with a portrait of Dr. Herrick, its principal, is to be made a test case by our Government. Secretary Gresham has cabled a formal demand on the Turkish Government for reparation, and has also entered a protest against the violation of the United States mails. Dr. Herrick's letters to the Consulate, notifying it of the outrage were opened and some of them detained.

The twelfth anniversary or the International Medical Missionary Society was held in the Marble Collegiate Church, New York, on March 23. Attention was called to the fact that beside its chief work of training medical missionaries for work in heathen lands it had done valuable service in New York through its eight dispensaries. No less than 150,000 patients had been treated there and 25,000 had been visited in their homes. The average admission of students has been at the rate of fifty each year. Dr. John G. Kerr from China was present at the meeting and described his experience as a medical missionary in Canton. Dr. Geo. D. Dowkontt is sanguine of realizing the sum needed for the Laboratory of the college.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

THE ETERNAL PARADOX.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, April 16, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D. Text: "He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." Matt. 10: 39.

TO the superficial reader this text is self-contradictory; to the careful thinker it is harmonious and sublime. It is the formulation of a universal and eternal law. The man who loveth himself dies; the man who loves God supremely and his fellowmen rightly, lives here and will live in glory forever.

There is a sense in which all the higher truths are obscure and mystical, whether they be truths of science, art or religion. Nature gives up her secrets only to her ardent worshippers; to see her beauties our eye must be trained; to hear her hidden harmonies our ear must be cultivated. To appreciate the Alps we must have mountains in our brains; to enjoy the sea we must have oceans in our soul. So to see God we must have the appropriate faculty—purity of heart; to understand his teaching we must have devotion to his will. They who do his will shall know his doctrine. The words of Christ were seed-thoughts, whose germination has only begun; much as they have developed they will develop vastly more in the ages to come.

Germinal Truth.

"Heirs of the ages though we be" the ages yet to come shall have a nobler heritage of truth for our heirs. Our fathers saw truth from afar and rejoiced; we touch the hem of her garment and find virtue in the touch. But our sons shall be admitted into her presence and commune with her forever. Christ spoke with a seeming obscurity because he could not speak otherwise. Earthly language can scarcely bear up under the weight of human thought; it breaks down utterly under God's thought. Christ packed away so much thought into his words that no one generation can get it all out. His words had a meaning for the simple men who first heard them and they are to have an ever-expanding meaning for all time. It is this fact which gives them their freshness, their charm; and their power. Their flower and aroma are constantly revealing themselves. The sayings of Christ open to us worlds of thought and feeling into which we may enter, but which are too full to be emptied of all their treasures by human hearts and minds. Our text is one of these suggestive germinal truths. It is an epitome of the wisdom and history of the past; and it is a prophecy of the wisdom and history of the future. It furnishes the crucial test of character, explains the secret of true greatness. I shall endeavor to illustrate both sides of the truth here presented in the order in which they are given.

Life Lost and Found.

First, then, how can it be averred with truth, "He that findeth his life shall lose it?" A fuller interpretation of the word life will [illegible] of the possibility of finding it [illegible] it, and will also reduce the seeming [illegible] to perfect harmony. As we have [illegible] uses here the same word, [illegible] uses. The first refers to the natural, physical, lower life; the second to the higher, nobler, spiritual life. In the 29th verse [illegible] passes from one meaning to the other. The idea is, "He that is bound up in himself, in saving his earthly life, shall lose his spiritual life; but he who in his devotion to Christ is [illegible] lower life shall save his higher life. The truth here taught goes to the very centre of being; [illegible] his mortal life in the service of Christ shall [illegible] immortal life—if I may so speak. And [illegible] the future life—the words of comparison being used in the past tense—but between the outward, secular, earthly life, and the inward, spiritual, eternal life which commences on earth and will be perfected in heaven. The man who has not lost himself to this lower life is dead even now, and the man who has found himself in Christ has this life even now.

Christ teaches us that to live is more than to be. Mere being is only the animal side of living; but true living is

The Godlike Side of Being.

Those who heard these pregnant words from the lips of Jesus were to be prepared for his sake to give up their bodily lives; his reference to the cross shows that he had that possibility in mind. In our day the words have a somewhat different application. We are not called upon to give up our lives as martyrs; but we are called upon to give up the sinful self-life of the old man, which is truly death, and which is to be lost by an internal and continual crucifixion, in order that we may find our true life both here and hereafter. To lose life, then, in the application of the sense of the text to ourselves, is to lose our sinful self. To lose self is to lose sin, and sin, when finished, is death. This explanation harmonizes the text with itself and with all our experience.

All the principles of action among men may be reducible to two. The first is that of Satan and Cain; the second is that of Christ and Paul. The first in Satan exalts above all that is called God; and in Cain sneeringly asks, "Am I my brother's keeper?" The second in Christ says, "Not my will but thine be done," and in Paul, "I count not my life dear unto me;" and in both Christ and Paul loses its life that others may find life. We are all to-day obeying one or the other of these principles. Our only hope, as individuals and churches, is that we shall follow, here and everywhere, in the footsteps of Christ. Our prayer should be that we may be lifted out of this low, sinful, dying, self-life into the high and holy and Christly life of him who is the way, the truth, and the life.

The Life Sacrificed.

Permit me also briefly to illustrate the other side of my text: "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." If it be true that selfishness is the essence of sin, and that sin is death, that loving our lower life begets disease, that corrupts, and finally the canker which destroys the soul's true life, then the opposite of this—self-abnegation—must produce opposite effects. True living must be in our loving God and our fellow-men, laboring "together with God" for their good. This truth Jesus taught in his works, his words, and his death. His life was an illustration of and a commentary on my text. His was a life of self-sacrifice. He lives now, the mightiest force in the world's thought, because once he gave his life for the world's sin. He is the world's prophet, priest and king, because he was the world's sacrifice. Never did kingly crown betoken such royalty, or demand and receive such homage, as Christ's crown of thorns. He was maligned, mocked, murdered; but no one ever charged him with living for himself. His enemies sneeringly said, "He saved others; himself he cannot save." His complete self-abnegation is marvelous. He had no self-life. He knew himself only as obedient to God, and ministrant to man. His life is so blended with that of his Father that he could say, "He that believeth on me believeth not on me, but on him that sent me;" and yet in his consciousness of personality he could triumphantly say, "I lay down my life, and take it up again—no man taketh it from me."

The Conquering Power.

Those who have taken in the meaning of Christ's life, who at his cross have kindled their hearts with his love, and who by daily communion with their risen Lord have kept the flame burning, are the men and the women who are to win the world to Christ. God knows men, and with a justice unwavering and a wisdom unerring he rewards them. The law of my text is universal as gravitation, and eternal as God. It is not an arbitary enactment, but the revelation of an eternal principle. If we put ourselves in line with it by coming as helpless sinners to Jesus, losing at his cross our poor, sinful, selfish, lower life, we shall find our higher life here and eternal glory hereafter. If we refuse, and cling to our dying life we must die now, and we shall die the second death hereafter.

And as Christ was thus obedient to the will of God, so Paul was obedient to the will of Christ, and could say, "I live, yet it is not I that liveth, but Christ that liveth in me." He lost himself in his devotion to Christ, and yet he stands more conspicuously before the world than any other man. No personality is more unique, none so imperishable, as that of Paul. He counted not his life dear unto him; he was willing to give it up—he did give it up—for Christ; he and if necessary so losing himself he found a life, which the Christian world will cherish forever. And all of us who have met great temptations, and who have overcome them through him who has loved us and given himself for us, have learned that in losing ourselves at the altar of Christ we have found our nobler life. When a man first learns that he is a child of God through faith in Jesus; that he has gone out of his old, sinful self-life into that of God, a thrill of intenser being, such as he never knew before, fills his soul. Such a man sees God in everything and everything in God. He loses all dread of eternity; God and eternity are in him and he in them. A great love which puts a man into sympathy with others' hearts reproduces in him something of the life and love of all those with whom he thus sympathizes; and the greater the tension of his love, the greater will be the intension of this life. It was thus that Christ could taste death for every man, for his life took in that of every man.

Profoundly is he to be pitied who has never known a love which has enabled him to enter into and partake of another's life; unspeakably happy is he who has so entered into and partaken of the life of Christ; for he who has fellowship with him in his sufferings shall have kinship with him in his triumphs.

The Highest Life

—like Christ's—is always the most unconscious life. Let us remember that Christ, in giving us such a principle as my text contains, is not forcing upon us an arbitrary rule; he is merely revealing the universal law of life. It is not true simply because he uttered it; but more strictly speaking, he uttered it because it is true. The geologist does not make the laws of his science; he reveals them. This law existed before Christ came, and would exist had he never come; he merely revealed it. With this law conform the lives of all men who have become truly great. They did their work; they thought not of themselves. They were willing to be lost and God found them. When the tide of public feeling turned against Socrates all his pupils left him but one. A sophist twittingly said, "Ha! Socrates, your reputation is gone, you have but one pupil." "Yes," said he, "but that one is Plato." Day by day he walked the groves and taught his pupil, and that pupil, by the influence of his writings, has made Socrates walk through the world as a teacher ever since. He was willing to lose not only his pupils, but his life, in support of the truths he taught; and no sooner was he dead than he rose to live in the world's history. He lost his life; he found a higher life. I do not indorse him in all his life; but heathen though he was, he illustrates the truth of my text. This principle is illustrated in the case of Savonarola,

The Florentine Friar, whose aim was to glorify Christ and to purify the Roman church. He died a martyr, but his death was his life; it made him immortal, and being dead, he spoke from his grave to Martin Luther, and other reformers, cheering them on to victory. Twenty years after his death, Raphael painted his portrait among the saints in the halls of the Vatican. In 1789 all England was astonished when Wilberforce delivered his great speech on the slave trade. Burke declared that he was not surpassed by any of the great orators of Greece or Rome. But his friends mourned over the position which he had taken; it would estrange his warmest supporters, destroy his fair reputation, and blast his promising career. The brilliant young man who dazzled Paris and delighted England with his wit and wisdom was in his self-sacrificing course a mystery to all. But there is an explanation. At the age of twelve he learned at the house of a Methodist aunt something of Jesus and his love. The gaiety of the French court, the flattery of admirers, and the consciousness of triumph did not obliterate these thoughts. Conscience was continually active; and finally he felt himself to be a lost sinner. Then he saw the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world. At the Cross of Christ he found peace in believing. There he lost himself in the will of Christ, and there he determined that if he took part in the Government of Great Britain it would be as a servant of Jesus Christ. On Sunday the 28th of October, 1787, he wrote these words in his journal: "God Almighty has set before me two great objects—the suppression of the slave trade, and the reformation of manners." He knew the difficulties before him. "But then," said he, "we have God and Christ on our side, the crown is everlasting life and the struggle short compared with eternity." The love of Christ was his inspiration.

Victory out of Failure.

Could the astonished members of Parliament in 1789, who heard him speak and saw him vote have looked into that room where two years before he laid his life, his hopes and fears, his defeats and triumphs on the altar of Christ, they would have learned the secret of his power and the motive of his life. He lost himself; God found him, the world has honored, and eternity will glorify him.

The text finds its illustration not only in the great events of life, but also in the ordinary routine of duties when performed in the Spirit of Christ. The young man who, in a little homely meeting-house in Boston on a wet and cheerless evening in October, 1823, preached to a few shivering people a sermon which the next morning he confessed to have been an utter failure, saying it fell perfectly dead, was finding himself when he little dreamed of such a result. A thoughtful deacon had the sermon published. It soon ran through several editions. A leading Presbyterian highly praised it, and Robert Hall on reading it predicted a brilliant future for its author. Its subject was "The moral Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise." That sermon made Francis Wayland president of Brown University, and made him his country's Wayland.

Often in morals, as in science, we are obliged to reason back from the facts to the law governing the facts. In this way, from our observations of life, we might have discovered some such law as that stated in the text. For we know well that when a man deliberately proposes self as the object of his worship it is not difficult to foresee the result. Such worship degrades the man—doing violence to all his nobler instincts and aspirations. Such a man sinks from love into hate; from life into death. Thus the fearful and of seeking self ends, directly in harmony with the fundamental law of life, in losing self. This is also its indirect result. Outside influences co-operate with the laws of being in bringing about this result. Society is suspicious of such men. It watches them, combines against them, overthrows their best-laid plans, defeats their projects, and gives to others the prizes which they fondly hoped to win. Novelists teach a great truth when they make villainy fail of its end, just because of the villainous means by which it hoped to gain its end. God is neither asleep nor on a journey; and he will most effectively thwart the selfish by permitting them to fall into their own snares.

History illustrates and corroborates this truth. Never had a man a grander opportunity for doing grandly than had Pilate. Never did a man fail so fatally. Never before might justice have appeared so just; never wickedness so wicked. His was a great part to act; it might have been sublime; it was unspeakably base. He sat on the throne of power, when he who had all power was weak before him; he was judging him who was the Judge of the quick and the dead. One scarcely dares think of the awful possibilities and destinies of time and eternity which hung on the actions of Pilate. We may not presume to go too far into these awful mysteries; but this we do know—Pilate

Ought to Have Done Right.

He was so disposed at the first. He knew little and he cared less about the annoying questions of these annoying Jews. Christ is to him at worst but a wild enthusiast; he finds him innocent of any crime; he will set him free. But Jewish hatred to Christ will not be baffled so easily. Priestly cunning will arouse self in Pilate, and thus accomplish its end. "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend." Pilate was an ambitious politician; the question is now no longer one of right. It is position, power, self on the one side; justice, truth, Christ on the other side. Pilate, as we all at some crisis in life, must slay the demon self or the divine Christ—must lose the lower life or forfeit the higher life. Self Pilate loved; self he was determined to find; he therefore slew Christ. His hands he might wash in the sight of the multitude from the blood of Christ, but his soul in the sight of heaven he could not wash from the sin of slaying the Holy One. He should have remembered the grand Roman motto, "Let justice be done though the heavens fall;" he should have made it impossible for the Jews to take Jesus. I do not judge Pilate by the Christian standard; such a judgment would be manifestly unjust. I judge him merely by the Roman law, which he was bound to execute, and by that law, according to his own confession, I condemn him.

A Double Loss.

But did Pilate gain his object? Did he cheat God? Did he falsify my text? To conciliate the Jews, and thereby retain his position, he violated every principle of right, and God made those very Jews his instruments in punishing Pilate, charging him with crimes before the home-government, and depriving him of the very office to retain which he sacrificed all justice. And Pilate in his lonely banishment in Gaul, finally taking his life with his own hand, losing himself with an eternal loss, is a fitting sequel to Pilate finding himself at the sacrifice of eternal rectitue. It is an awful crisis in a man's life when he must—as we all must at some time—decide between self and Christ. God help us all to do right when these great decisions are to be made!

"He that findeth his life shall lose it" was literally fulfilled in the case of Archbishop Cranmer. He confessed Christ against the devil and his first-born son, the Pope; and as a reward for his loyalty to truth he was ordered to be burned. Then in the hour of trial the flesh became weak; the lower life asserted itself over the higher; he recanted; but notwithstanding he signed six recantations nothing short of his death would satisfy his foes and he was burned on the 21st of March, 1556. The hand that signed the recantation he held in the flames to be burned first, as an atonement for its baseness; and that shriveled hand seems still to point with warning finger to the words, "He that saveth his life shall lose it."

Many Losers.

These illustrations might be greatly multiplied. The pages both of profane and sacred history are blotted over with the names of those who—to save self—became traitors to their country, their souls and their God—those who, to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, sacrificed on the altar of self all that is noble in manhood and glorious in immortality. Looking at their folly and wickedness one might speak harshly, but remembering that we all find in our own hearts so much of self and sin, our severity gives place to pity and our pride to prayer.

And, God be thanked, this finding is not limited to those whose loss for Christ is conspicuous before the world. Those sweet and gentle natures, who come like angels of God to earth, and then pass away before their work seems half done, have not lived in vain. A man's infirmity is often his power. You remember Kirke White's plaintive song, "I shall die and be forgotten, and the world will go on as if I had never been; and yet how have I loved, how have I longed, how have I aspired!" We feel to-day the impulse of his brief life, and poetry catches new inspiration at his grave. And all that host of unknown men and women whose presence has —though their hallowed names may not like Howard's be mentioned in the households of the world—those quiet, patient wives and mothers, whose tears are now jewels, and whose groans are angelic music—all those who loved Christ and labored for him, in however humble a capacity, while their eyes grew brighter, their cheeks paler, and their hearts purer, until they laid aside the vail of flesh and gently passed away—God holds them in everlasting remembrance.

Filled the World with Blessing

Do we talk of our losses for Christ? Compared with his cross what is ours? Compared with his sacrifice we shall be ashamed to mention ours. There is no corner sufficiently obscure to hide a man who has zeal to work, patience to wait, and faith to pray. The world wants such men, and it will find them. God wants such men, and he reaches out his hand to them and says, "Come up higher." The quiet, faithful, self-sacrificing men and women who are willing to lose themselves for Christ are those who do the work of Christ in the world. To those who seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness will be added all other things. O men and women, give yourselves to God. Lay your poor, weak lives at his feet; let him take your sinful hearts that he may make them his temple. Let this lower, earthly, sinful self die with Christ on the cross; then you shall live to walk here with Christ in newness of life and forever with him in the bliss of heaven.

THE FRIGATE-BIRD OF BRAZIL.

(Tachypetes-aquilina.

Written for "The Christian Herald".

ONE frigate-bird, thou'rt coming o'er the deep,
Through sunset glow, to quiet isle asleep,
To sepulchre where all thy kindred lie,
Thou'rt coming home, unerringly to die!

Far hast thou roamed, but now, thy duty done,
Back to thy race, brave bird, at set of sun
Thou'rt coming on, with unabated breath,
To face in faith the phantom men call death.

So would I go, life's service all complete,
In faith and love, trusting Christ's summons, sweet,
Gathered to him as child to mother's breast:
"Come ye to me and I will give you rest."

—MRS. M. E. THROPP-CONE.

Santa Barbara is the largest island of the Abrolhos, a cluster group off the Brazilian coast midway between Bahia and Rio Janeiro. At its southwestern extremity is a little isle, whitened by birdlime and bones, called "O Cemeterio." It is the strange, pathetic fact, as we were assured, that the frigate-bird in the vicinity invariably resorted to this sepulchral-looking spot on the approach of death, and that the islet was strewn with their bones. "At low water one day," says Prof. C. F. Hartt, the geologist, "I visited 'the cemetery,' and I found such to be actually the case. There were the remains of hundreds of these birds, some freshly dead, but the most of the skeletons were dessicated and bleached. Nowhere else did I see a dead frigate-bird, and it would seem that for generation after generation they had gone to 'O Cemeterio' to die."

COME TO JESUS.

O SOUL, alone and weary,
With burdens hard oppressed,
Come lean thy fainting heart to-night
Upon the Saviour's breast.

A refuge safe and quiet
In Jesus thou shalt find;
The calmness of his changeless love
Will heal thy troubled mind.

O soul, grown sick of sinning,
Bowed low with shame and grief,
Christ waiteth to receive thee now;
His mercy brings relief.

O heart, oppressed and weary,
Thy rest thou'lt never find
Until thou find it in the arms
So strong and true and kind.

AN APOCALYPTIC MYSTERY.

Who Were the Nicolaitanes Against Whom the Church is Warned?

BY SIR S. ARTHUR BLACKWOOD, K. C. B.*

THE attempts to identify the Nicolaitanes with a special heretical sect, and to trace their origin to a particular individual, have confessedly failed, but we are, nevertheless, bound to use every means at our disposal in order to ascertain who they were, what were their "deeds," and what was their "doctrine." For concerning them the great High Priest speaks in these mysterious utterances, to which he seven times calls the hearing ear to hearken, not once, but twice.

In Rev. 2: 14, 15, where those that "hold the doctrine of Balaam" are evidently identical with those that hold "the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes," we are set upon the right track. The name of Balaam, according to the best etymology, signifies destroyer of the people, and Nicolaos is no more than a Grecizing of this name. Now, how did Balaam act so as to be a "destoyer of the people?" He "taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel," to eat things sacrified to idols, and to commit fornication." In other words, having failed to carry out Balak's wish, so as to curse the people that they might be overcome in open warfare, and eager to obtain "the wages of unrighteousness," he suggested that by means of the attractiveness of "the daughters of Moab, Israel might be led into such a union with them as would make them no longer an enemy to be feared. Too well did he succeed. The Midiantish women invited the people to the sacrifices of their gods, "and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods. And Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor." They were "mingled among the heathen, and learned their works, and they served their idols."

It is clear, then, that if the expression "Nicolaitanes" has the same meaning, we should expect to find that their deeds and doctrines tended in the same direction, and that some had arisen in the early Church to play the same part with regard to the followers of Christ that Balaam played with regard to Israel. Can there be, then, a doubt that when our Lord, in figurative terms, alludes to the presence of those who, like Balaam, would seduce his people from the path of separation, and thus destroy them by mingling them with the world, and who, lording it over the general body of Christians, would arrogate to themselves power and wealth, he would speak to them as "subduers of the people,"—the mass or laity of the Church,—and give them the enigmatical title of Nicolaitanes, a title which accurately describes their character and work?

And does not history confirm such an interpretation? Very soon indeed (for the mystery of iniquity had begun to work even in Paul's day—II. Th. 2: 7) did there arise men claiming superiority in spiritual matters, forming themselves into a separate clique or caste of "clericals" (thus applying to themselves the name belonging to the whole heritage, or cleroi) calling themselves "the Church" as distinguished from the laity, and becoming, ere long—and notably when the empire became nominally Christian—the prime agents in bringing about that absorption of the world into the Church, or mixture of the Church with the world, that has made what is called Christendom for many centuries little else than baptized Paganism.

They have usurped the dignity of the priesthood appertaining solely to the Great High Priest, assuming to be mediators between God and men, and claiming to offer sacrifices for sins, to forgive sinners, and to admit to or exclude from heaven. They have lorded it over the professing Church with a diabolical tyranny, and have allured into the paths of destruction millions upon millions, by the lusts of the flesh and the false promises of liberty.

Yes. Nicolaitanism is Priestcraft, Clericalism, Sacerdotalism, seen in its full-blown form in Rome, in its blossom in Ritualism, and in its bud wherever a so-called minister of the Gospel of Christ takes a position of superiority over his fellow-Christians—otherwise than as a teacher over scholars—and in any degree assumes sacredotal functions. Such a one becomes a subduer of the laity—a destroyer of the people, like Balaam, a gainsayer of high-priestly prerogative, like Korah.

Prophecy predicts this terrible evil; history attests its rise and progress; it is that which Christ "hates," and which has done more to debase, degrade, and unchristianize the Church of God than all other forms of error, for it has absorbed them all into itself. It has wrought havoc for nearly two millenniums. Its downfall, thank God, is sure and imminent.

Mrs. J. Q. Logan, Sargent, Colo. Please explain Isa 66: 3.

The passage doubtless refers to heathen sacrifices. It practically says that a sacrifice, if offered in a wrong spirit, even though the sacrifice might be in accord with the Levitical law, would be as offensive to God as if a man had been killed and offered in sacrifice. Its teaching for our time is that gifts to the church or to philanthropic objects though commendable in themselves are not acceptable to God if the giver presents them with the object of getting glory or popularity to himself.

THE CHOICE OF LIFE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing April 30. Prov. 1: 29; Matt. 6: 19-24.

EVERY man has his choice. Neither riches nor poverty, neither distinguished station nor obscurity, neither talent and education nor obtuseness and ignorance can rob him of his right to decide on the object for which he shall live. He may make his choice deliberately or unconsciously; but in one way or the other, he does make it. Other people may influence him in it if he will let them, and, as time passes, he may drift into associations which restrict his freedom and render it difficult for him to live as he desires to live; but the responsibility of his choice of the chief object in life is his own and the joy or the penalty will be his own. The fact cannot be brought too early or too clearly before the mind. No child, who is able to think at all, is too young to learn that it is for him to decide whether he will live to the flesh or the spirit, whether he will serve God or mammon. God has left him free to make his choice. It was essential to the production of the highest order of intel- [illegible] that men should be free to choose the evil, if he wished to do so. Where there is compulsion there is neither strength nor honor. The man who, being free to choose, deliberately chooses the good, is the man of whom something can be made. He is fit for higher conditions and will reach them on planes of being stretching ever upward and onward to infinity. Every man stands as Adam stood in Eden and he may take what is "pleasant for the eyes and good for food," or may put it away from him and choose the course of self-denial and spiritual good. If he takes the former, he forfeits the privilege of intercourse with God and would no longer delight in it if he could have it. He has taken his place with the animal nature within him; and the Godlike nature, which is also within him, dies. Before his decision, it was open to him to nourish and develop the one nature or the other, and his choice has been that of the multitude. To cultivate the animal nature is easy and pleasant and the means are ever within reach. To cultivate the spiritual is a perpetual combat, a perpetual restraint of the clamorous brute within, which is eager for indulgence, watching for every moment of relaxed vigilance; a life of struggle, of disappointment, of lonely vigils, of weary conflict that could not be endured, if God did not give the struggler the help of his almighty strength. It is between these two paths that we stand, and on our own choice depends our destiny. If we live for the flesh we die, but if we live for the spirit, we begin an everlasting life.

MRS. E. A. HILL,
Pres. of the Florida W. C. T. U.

THE W. C. T. U. IN FLORIDA.

An interesting feature of reformatory work is that which has recently been developed in Florida under the auspices of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Mrs. E. A. Hill the President of the Union in that State, has been laboring earnestly to propagate the principles of the White Ribbon Army and to thoroughly perfect its organization for effective work. She and her sisters in the cause were recently greatly encouraged by the gift of several acres of land for the use of the Union. They propose as soon as they have accumulated a building fund to erect a large auditorium on this site which shall serve as State headquarters for the Union. They have named their little estate Somerset Park in honor of Lady Henry Somerset whose work in England and whose services to the cause during her recent visit to America the ladies of the W. C. T. U. heartily appreciate. The Park has already been put to useful purpose in entertaining Union Conventions and Temperance picnics in the open air. With the recent experience of severe weather experienced in the north there would not seem to have been much occasion for some months past for such entertainments, but the illustration on this page, which is reproduced from the photograph of a convention held in Somerset Park in February last, shows that a February picnic in Florida may be enjoyed. The ladies believe that the Park will prove a most useful and valuable acquisition to their Union. So many visitors from various States of the Union now spend part or the whole of their winters in Florida, that an opportunity is afforded of influencing public opinion in distant places in favor of Temperance, through the visits of representative people.

A chapter of the League which stands high on the roll for efficient organization is that of Petoskey, Mich. It has a membership of 120, all of whom are earnest, enthusiastic workers. It has accumulated a library of two hundred volumes chiefly on subjects specialy interesting to Methodists and League workers.—The Simpson Church at Detroit, Mich., was the scene, recently of an enthusiastic League gathering. Papers were read on the life and works of Whittier and on the discoveries of Spanish and English explorers. These, with the contributions of the musical members of the League made up an evening's entertainment which was thoroughly enjoyed by all who were present.—The Epworth Herald reports a novel entertainment recently held by the League at Bridgeton, N. J. The members occupied the evening with five minute talks on the subject in which they were most interested. A very curious medley of subjects they were but the speakers made them interesting and instructive. The ladies spoke on Dressmaking, Carpets, Millinery, Stenography, Housekeeping, Cooking, etc., and the men on Shoes, Carpentering, Glass, Nails, etc. The pastor also added a specialty of his own on his experiences in performing the marriage ceremony.—On April 6th, the Brooklyn Chapter, of which Mr. Charles E. Teal is President, gave a musical entertainment in the Hanson Place Church which attracted a large audience. This chapter has an average attendance at the Sunday evening prayer meeting of two hundred and several times lately over four hundred have been present. It has also a strong attachment in the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific circle of sixty members and its Mercy and Help Department is in active and vigorous operation.

A COLORADO B. Y. P. U. VISIT.

The Denver Union of Baptist Young People has adopted the plan of fraternal visits. A short time ago the young people went by special train to Golden, about fifteen miles distant, to hold a union service with the Golden B.Y.P.U. The other young people's societies in Golden desiring to participate, the opera house was secured; but the large turn-out of the Golden people, augmented by over four hundred Denverites, was too much for the capacity of the opera house, and a second meeting was conducted in the Baptist church. Rev. H. H. Beach, of Golden, gave a hearty "welcome," to which President Lake of the Denver Union responded. Rev. Kerr B. Tupper, D.D., made stirring addresses at both meetings. Testimony services were held, and some of the young people declared themselves desirous of partaking of the free salvation through faith which is in the Saviour Jesus Christ. The excursion was a delightful experience, and on the journey back to Denver, which occupied nearly an hour, the time was appropriately occupied by services of song in the several coaches of each train.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Taylorville, Ill., is now in its new quarters, consisting of parlors, reading room, recreation room, gymnasium and baths. The attendance at Sunday meetings is increasing.

Eighteen members of the Y. M. C. A. of Dallas, Tex., have made confession of Christ during the past season, all of whom have been won at the meetings of the association. The roll of membership now contains 503 names, with an average daily attendance of 120.

SOLD THE FARM.

OUR father has sold the farm.
The hill, and the flowery mead:
The green where the chickens used to feed,
And the barn where they nestled warm.
The chambers resound at morn,
But not to our father's voice;
Another goes with his gleesome boys,
To mould the rustling corn—
Our father has sold the farm.

The money is counted and paid,
The deed is witnessed and sealed;
And everything in each beautiful field,
The wealth of another is made.
The room where the children were born,
Where Mary and Benjamin died,
The roses and flowery borders that sighed,
When the hearts that loved them were gone.
Our father has sold his farm.

O! why did our father sell!
Because, on a beautiful day,
The soul of our mother was carried away,
In the home of the angels to dwell.
But O! there are memories still,
That sigh in the wings of the breeze;
That glide o'er the garden, and flit by the trees
And rest on the brow of the hill.
Our father has sold his farm.

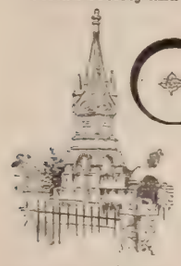
Home Life in Liberia.

How Africa's Sole Republic is Progressing in Christian Civilization—A Glimpse of Liberian Society and Culture as it is To-day.



COMING into the port of Monrovia, the capital of the Liberian Republic on the West Coast of Africa, the traveler is struck with the pleasant and attractive appearance of the town. It lies a little back from the beach on a gentle slope, and is clean-looking and light. Between it and the ocean are the palm-thatched houses of Krootown, with rows of slender canoes, turned bottom upward on the white sands. Monrovia looks like some thrifty and prosperous New England sea-coast village, and is as far removed, in outward appearance, from the popular conception of an African town as could well be imagined. It is a patch of Western civilization set in amid a wilderness of ignorance and half-heathenism. Its quiet, grassy streets, beautified by native palm-trees, are very inviting, and its buildings would not discredit many American villages.

PREST. ROBERTS' TOMB.

The story of the founding of the first African republic by a brave company of colonists from America, and of their early struggles and sacrifices before they finally conquered the natural obstacles that opposed them, and won the confidence of the native Liberians, has already been told in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Now the descendants of these colonists are reaping the fruits of the hardships and sufferings their predecessors endured. With a Congress and Constitution modeled after our own, with a number of industries fairly active, and with prospects steadily improving, the Liberians have the way open to become, if they will, a power for Christ and civilization in Africa. They need more schools and colleges, better roads, and individually and collectively a new infusion of energy and the spirit of modern progress. The 18,000 or more Afro-Americans in Liberia will yet have to solve the problem of ultimately governing, civilizing and harmonizing native tribes, aggregating nearly twelve times their own number. That this result is still very remote is shown by the fact that several wars are now going on among the tribes, in which the Liberians have become involved.

On this page are several illustrations that will help the reader in forming an impression of the present condition of Liberian society. The monument to the late President Roberts was erected by his widow. Mr. Roberts served the Republic as Executive during four terms of two years each. After an interval of about ten years he served three terms more. He was a remarkably able man and at his death bequeathed some valuable property to the Methodist Episcopal Church. His widow has recently been engaged in an effort to raise money in England and this country to build a hospital in Liberia. The group of portraits includes Hon. J. J. Cheeseman, the present President of the Republic, Rev. Mr. Gibson, his Secretary of State, and Isaac Dickinson, his Aide-de-Camp. Another illustration shows the Executive Mansion at Monrovia, with the Liberian flag drooping at the pole in front.

Prof. O. F. Cook, writing to the New York State Colonization Society, says of the black republic: "There is now plenty of society in Liberia eminently civilized in its way. What is needed is a considerable element of the population interested and earnest in intellectual and moral matters. In a country where the conditions of life are as easy as in Liberia, culture must be sought for its own sake alone. To maintain high standards requires much more stedfastness than in the United States. Fortunately the negro mind is strangely open to suggestions of the right kind, and quick to choose the line of improvement."

There is a general dearth of domestic animals in Liberia. The Mandingoes, an interior tribe, have many horses, but at Monrovia there are hardly any. Horses are found at Lagos and Boporu. Sheep, cattle, goats, chickens, turkeys and ducks are successfully raised by the Liberians. There are many successful coffee plantations in the republic. The houses in Monrovia are of brick, stone or wood, generally substantial and kept in neat trim. Prominent among the structures are Liberia College a short distance to the southeast of the town, and the Methodist Seminary. The business part of the town lies so low that it is little wonder that the mortality among white stranger is so great, but the residence portion is on higher ground.

Church and mission work in Liberia makes excellent progress and the Gospel is gradually extending far into the interior.

Col. DICKINSON, Aide-de-Camp. Hon. J. J. CHEESEMAN, President. Rev. Dr. GIBSON, Sec'y of State.

Words of Sympathy.

THERE is value in the simplest expression of unaffected interest and sincere concern. It deprives sorrow of more or less inseparable feeling of loneliness. It is a proof to the stricken heart that the burden is shared by others. With God's blessing it applies help and comfort. He who has words at his command will do well to use them thoughtfully as possible in the blessed ministration of sympathy. He who has no choice of words, but can only in simple bluntness of speech make manifest his own concern at his neighbor's distress, will do well not to be too timid. The mere hand grasp, with the transfigured look, and the faltering words that have genuineness of soul in them, will tell the other all he needs to know.

The Palm-Bush in the Parlor.

You may make your life bright from now on whether rich or poor, sick or well, called or not to the foreign field, wherever you are, if you will walk in the sunshine, writes Rev. Dr. Cuyler. The sunshine will reach you, for Christ is always sunshine to those that seek his light and love it and bask in it. As plants need it, so we plants of Christ do. Only the other day in my own home a little palm bush tried to bloom. It was in the front parlor. It put out its smothered flowers. It seemed to be struggling in that way for four or five days, I believe. My wife took it on one of the cool days of last month to the rear of the parlor where the sun shone, and within thirty minutes after the time it was taken there, it had opened. There it was hungering and thirsting for sunlight, and we did not know it. When my wife put it where the sunshine fell, as if by a sudden inspiration it burst into bloom. How many here are there waiting for that? If you will bask in the sunshine of Christ, then when the Master calls you, in the dark or in the light, you will be ready to do his bidding.

Motherly Patience.

IT was about fifty years ago that in a small apartment of a certain city a newly married pair set up a home. The first guest that was invited to the residence was the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Bible given the bride on the first day of her espousals was the guide of that household. Days of sunshine were followed by days of shadow. Did you ever know a home that for fifty years had no vicissitude? Years passed on, and there were in that home hilarities, but they were good and healthful; and sorrows, but they were comforted. Marriages as bright as orange blossoms could make them, and the burials in which all hearts were riven. They have a family lot in the cemetery, but all the place is illuminated with stories of resurrection and reunion. The children of the household that lived have grown up; and they are all Christians, the father and mother leading the way, and the children following. What care the mother took of wardrobe and education and character and manners! How hard she sometimes worked! When the head of the household was unfortunate in business she sewed until her fingers were numb and bleeding at the tips. And what close calculation of economies, and what ingenuity in refitting the garments of the elder children for the younger! And only God kept account of that mother's sideaches and headaches and heartaches and the tremulous prayers by the side of the sick child's cradle, and by the couch of this one fully grown. The neighbors often noticed how tired she looked, and old acquaintances hardly knew her in the street; but without complaint she waited and toiled and endured all these years.

In a Uganda Home.

MISS ADELAIDE ELY, one of our subscribers, sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD another very interesting letter from Miss Annie E. Myers now in Uganda, Africa, in which the writer tells something of the domestic life of the natives. She writes:

"They eat ants, snakes, frogs, rats, caterpillars and things of that kind. Goats, deer, pigs and chickens are a great treat for them. Meat is eaten with greater relish when it has begun to decompose. Women are not allowed to touch animal food, as it is considered 'holy' and only fit for men; and they live mostly on vegetables.

"I have learned the language well enough to talk to the children about ordinary things. One evening, I told them that the sun did not move, but the earth did, and they were surprised. I try to tell them about the difference in countries and the distance between them. They look at me in astonishment and say, 'God is so good to send us a teacher.' I shall be glad when I can speak to them about our dear Saviour and his love to us and them. This station is only about two years old, and I think we have nearly forty Christian boys.

"Some have very bright minds and sweet dispositions. A number of those who came here are now able to read and write."

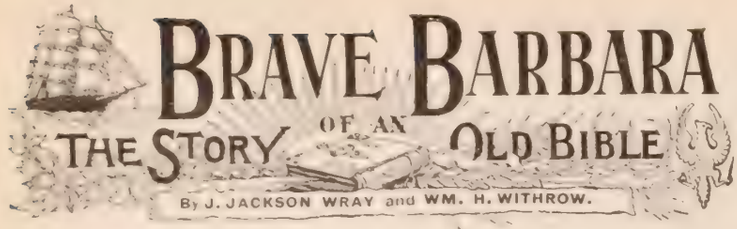
A Beautiful Life.

A WESTERN reader sends us some lines in commemoration of the gracious life and character of a very dear friend and they are so unique in their description of the daily record of Christian living that we give them here:

His early Sunday morning song
Kept singing Monday, Tuesday long.
And Tuesday, with his morning prayer,
His song still floated on the air;
And Wednesday reading of the Word,
He sang the song of Christ, the Lord;
Thursday the echoes of the strain
Of love and duty would remain;
Friday and Saturday each day
He sung, and read, and knelt to pray,
And [illegible] from week to week was given
His praises to the Lord in heaven.

It was not one week set apart,
But daily it was in his heart;
When at the end of each refrain
He prayed for strength to so remain



CHAPTER VI.
MIGRATION.

EVERY one who heard John Lawrence's [illegible] there being no better place for a chapel than the land just acquired by Mayor Hodgkiss in John Street.

The Mayor, however, was no friend to the Methodists and had even been heard saying that, the Rigging-Loft and the fanatics who met there were a nuisance. Small chance did there seem to be of getting any of his land as a site for a chapel. Barbara Heck thought of it, prayed about it and finally resolved on seeing the Mayor and asking for a strip of his land. She reasoned that God could so turn his heart that he would sell them as much as was needed; nay that he might give them the land. True to her livelong habit of seeking guidance from the Divine Helper, Barbara laid her plans, as Hezekiah did the letter of Sennacherib, "before the Lord." Some days elapsed before she felt moved to seek the interview she so strongly desired, and then, despite the protest of her husband who had no faith in her success, she set out for the city, bent on bearding the lion in his lair; or, in plainer speech, on seeking an audience with the Mayor in his busy and crowded warehouse. The mayor's stores fronted on one of main arteries of the city, and Barbara was not surprised to see the long, low line of buildings closely skirted with bullock wagons, carts, buggies and other vehicles. These were being emptied or laden with such merchandise as the thriving mayor dealt in. But there was one thing that did surprise her, and that was the face of her bronzed and bearded kinsman, Peter Schweitzer, and the winsome features of his son David.

That sweet singer, David, caught sight of Barbara as she was cautiously threading her way around the wheels of the lumbering bullock-wagon from which the father and son were unloading the harvest spoils they had brought from the farm at Ballypeter. David had been lightening his labor, and giving voice to the lightness of his heart, by singing some of the songs of Zion, with which he was accustomed to wake the solitudes of their distant home among the hills; and many a passer-by, even in that busy thoroughfare, had paused to listen to the charm of his "wood-notes wild."

Now, the unlading operations in which the two Schweitzers were engaged were being conducted directly under the open window of Mayor Hodgkiss's private office, and as that gentleman was busily occupied at his desk, his unaccustomed ears were regaled by the rousing ditties that his Majesty's loyalest of lieges, John Wesley, had provided for his people. That is how it was that the hymn "for the King" came floating through the open window of the mayor's office, and that that high dignitary heard, with smiles and nods, and strong approval, the words:

[illegible]

Just then it was that David caught sight of Barbara Heck. He hushed his song to greet her, in a voice that spoke of strong affection. [illegible] ha' thought of seeing you in these noisy quarters."

I do not gather that David and Brave Barbara did actually stand in this relationship. They were relatives, of that there is no doubt, though [illegible] and Peter Schweitzer, [illegible] high esteem and regard [illegible]

"I am here on business, Peter," said Barbara, smiling on him. "On the Lord's business, Peter; and both thyself and thy boy David must pray for me that it may be well done. Pray for me," she said, looking up at him, and speaking with great earnestness, "that, as Nehemiah said when he wanted to build up the walls of Jerusalem, God will 'grant me mercy in sight of this man.'"

"What man?" said father and son, in a breath.

"His worship the Mayor, whom may God guide aright," replied Barbara, "as he surely will."

Hereupon, the gentlemen so pointedly referred to quietly withdrew. He wondered to himself, as he returned to his desk, "what in the world the woman wanted," and, feeling strongly assured, though he could not very well account for it, that, whatever it was, in reason—and he could not bring himself to believe that she could ask what could be otherwise—he should most likely grant it.

After a moment's space a knock was heard at his door, the name of "Barbara Heck" was announced. "She wants to see you, sir, on business," said the servant at the door. "Ay, on the Lord's business," said the mayor to himself; and Brave Barbara was ushered in.

Without introduction, and with no circumlocution, Barbara told her errand; told how God had "prospered his work," and had compelled them to seek room wherein to grow: how that they had heard that his worship had bought land on John Street, how that they had heard that he had declared the space was more than he wanted; and that, after earnest prayer to God, she had come to ask him to give or sell them space on which to build a house for the worship of Almighty God.

The mayor does not seem to have made many inquiries, certainly not many objections. Whatever objections he might have had were answered without her knowledgs. One thing he did ask: "And what induced you to think that I should be willing to grant your request?"

"Well, sir," said Barbara, very much as a matter of course, "when our Lord wanted to enter into Jerusalem, he had only to say to those who could help him, 'The Lord hath need,' now that he wants to enter into the city of New York, he sends the same message to you—'The Lord hath need!' and," she continued, with the fervor of one in whom the Spirit speaks, "those who give bestowments to the Master shall in no wise lose their reward."

And so it came to pass that the land was given; and on the record of the time it is written that the Mayor subscribed also to the building fund; and so as Brave Barbara had predicted the "place" acquired was obtained for love, and with money, to make the donation more gracious and complete. It may be said here, that a list of those who contributed to that first Methodist chapel in the New World is still extant. Captain Webb is down for the sum of thirty pounds; the largest benefaction—and representing probably five hundred dollars of modern money. The sums recorded below that represent the gifts of willing donors, from his worship the Mayor down to the poor negroes, who are only mentioned by the one name their condition of servitude had given them. It is a document held in high esteem, by those who inhent the "trust" of that historic temple of the Lord.

We are told that it was large and "neat and clean and the floor covered over with sand as white as snow;" that Philip Embury, the pastor, "being a skillful carpenter, wrought upon it with great diligence." We are told that "there was no breast-work around the gallery-front"—which must have been a little [illegible] for those who sat in the front row—[illegible] that there was "no stairs, but only a rude ladder" by which to ascend. The seats on the ground-floor were "plain benches without backs."

Money was scarce, and mechanical labor [illegible] still; and so it was that Barbara [illegible] of the white-washing;"—a [illegible] fined to walls, and not used as in these degenerate times, to coat with a semblance of purity other surfaces as well. Brave Barbara seems to have done downright journeyman's work in this "up-rearing," though she received no journeyman's wages. It was done "all for love and nothing for reward;" except that which comes in time and turn to all who are "in love with duty, nobly done," and whose inspiration is "for Christ's sake."

Pastor Embury constructed the pulpit with his own hands, and, in due time, mounted the desk which his own honest hands had made, and dedicated that temple to the worship of Almighty God. Once again the old black-letter German Bible that Brave Barbara had brought from the little farm-house at Ballygarane was brought forth and placed on the sacred desk. Likely enough, it was a Lutheran Bible which had been brought by her Hussite ancestry from their Palatine home on the banks of the Rhine. From its sacred pages had come many an afflatus of light to cheer the soul and warm the heart of Christian confessors in dark days. Many a time and oft its sacred influence had lifted her own soul out of darkest night into lightsome day. As we have seen, this sacred volume had been linked with the history of these Irish colonists from the day that Philip Embury read from its passages on the deck of the Colleen Bawn by the quay of Londonderry, to the day when Captain Webb laid his sword upon it in the transformed rigging-loft. There was little wonder, therefore, that, as the old volume lay upon the sacred desk in the newly-built "Wesley Chapel," the eyes of its owner were wet with tears.

It was not long before the new chapel had eager occupants of most of its sittings. Since that distant day it has been more than once reconstructed, but at this day a portion of the original building still stands. There is a wooden clock now between its walls which was brought from Ireland by Philip Embury. It still marks the hours of worship, and the visitor can hear the stated tick of the slow pendulum just as it used to fall on the ears of the pioneer pastor of that day, as he spoke about "Jesus and his love." To this day there are marble tablets on its old and eloquent stones that commemorate the name of Brave Barbara, with a record of her beautiful character and her noble work. There also, in enduring stone, is inscribed a fitting memento of Philip Embury, the Barak, who, together with this Deborah, fought so bravely and victoriously the battles of the Lord.

Mainly through the personal influence of Captain Webb, John Wesley was made aware of the firm and abiding hold which his humble disciples had taken on the growing city of the West, and two missionaries were sent out from England, authorized and empowered by Wesley himself to take up the work so well and worthily begun. Richard Boardman and John Pilmoor were the pioneer pair thus harnessed to the Methodist plough, which had turned so deep a furrow, had received so much good seed, and realized so far a harvest under the hands of the exiles of Ballygarane. To these Philip Embury readily gave up his pulpit, glad, indeed, and thankful to be relieved of the responsibility.

Embury had never received any stipend, either fixed or casual, though the love and gratitude of his people found expression in gifts and favors, that told of appreciated service and high regard. "Sirs," he said, as he welcomed the two new comers to Wesley Church; "I have held this place like the lone outpost of a great army. . I rejoice to see the watchful care of these people, and the heavy duties of this office pass into other and better hands. May the Lord give you favor and prosperity, and make this house the birthplace of many souls. Something tells me that the work here is but at its beginning, and that you are but the 'relief force,' to announce the coming of the armies of the Lord!"

It gives us a very clear and suggestive insight into the poverty of these pioneer Gospellers of Wesley Chapel, to find that the trustees of the chapel, presented their retiring and departing pastor, "in the name of the congregation, with the sum of two pounds and five shillings," for the purchase of a Concordance of Holy Scripture, as a memento of his pastoral care of the loving people to whom he had so faithfully ministered in holy things. The words in which the good man returned thanks for this unexpected "keep-sake" have come down to us: "I need no gift," said he, in faltering speech, "and you know it, to keep your memory green. Ye are in my heart to live and die with you, but the hand of Providence beckons me elsewhere. A Concordance I have long desired to have that I might the better study the Word of God, and bring forth out of that treasure things new and old. Now that your love has placed it within my reach, I shall prize it for a double reason; and when distant from you, I shall still feel bound to you by the truest and tenderest tie, the bond that binds us all in the unity of the Book we love, in the concord of a common faith and the accord of a common life—you here, and I yonder, will live on in the glad assurance of a common hope of a personal reunion under the One Shepherd in One Fold, when his sheep are all at Home!"

With these final words, rounded by a benediction that touched all hearts, this humble, warm-hearted, wise-headed, hard-handed peasant-pastor, from the uplands of Ballygarane, passed away from the sight and note of the growing flock which he had gathered and tended with such apostolic care; and the fragrance of his memory clings, strong and beautiful, around the scene of his ministrations, even unto this day.

The war-cloud at this time was gathering thick and dark above the American colonies. Public opinion was becoming more and more hostile to the English crown, and this hostility was so sharply defined that the "king's men," even with officialism and militaryism to sustain them, were in a harrassed, though arbitrary minority. Those colonists who were anxious to live peaceably, "minding their own business," and enduring whatever ills they had for fear of flying to others that they wot not of, and willing to be quiet for loyalty and for conscience' sake, had a hard time of it. So hard and so heavy was their lot that they longed to get away into the still untroubled, untenanted, and uncultivated lands westward, where they might dwell in peace.

This was especially true of the main body of the Irish Palatines—those Protestant and German colonizers from Munster whose history has been briefly sketched in these columns. Our steady-going, silent, and strong principled friend Paul Heck, sturdily bent on standing by his love of peace, and his hatred of the sword as a Christian weapon, and equally bent on maintaining his traditional loyalty to his "rightful king," George the Third, was resolutely bent on "seeking a lodge in some vast wilderness." In this, his good wife, Brave Barbara, for her growing family's sake, was of one heart and mind with him; and so were the Emburys, the Rechels, the Schweitzers, and others of the Ballygarane exiles of former days.

Embarking in a small sloop on the broad and beautiful waters of the Hudson river—its crystal surface but seldom ruffled by the keels of commerce or the boats of strangers from the distant east—Barbara Heck and her little company of adventurers made their way along that noble stream which is now the busy highway to numberless towns and cities and populous regions whose existence was then undreamed of by all but a prophetic few.

It is eminently illustrative of this fine-souled pioneer Christian woman, and strikingly characteristic of her, that in her seat in the quietly-gliding bark that bore her and her belongings towards her unknown home in the unpeopled West, she sat with her dear, well-worn, well-loved German Bible on her knee. Reading aloud to her husband and the little band of thriving boys and girls who called her mother, to Philip Embury and his Mary, and their "beloved belongings," to John Lawrence, and, though last, not least, to Michael Finnigan, her loyal henchman, she read the words of raptured David. "I will extol thee, my God, O King; and I will bless thy name for ever and ever. Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised, and his greatness is unsearchable. I will speak of the glorious honor of thy majesty, and of thy wondrous works."

Passing along on their quest of a new home, our emigrants sailed by the quaint-fashioned Dutch town of Albany, sailed by the then still and silent loveliness where stands to-day the thriving city of Troy, where the names of Barbara Heck and Philip Embury are to this day as household words.

At length the place was reached where they had to leave the river bank and cross inland to the infant settlement by the borders of the Pawlet river, a district which was subsequently known as Washington County. The removal of their goods and chattels through a rough and all but trackless wilderness of uncleared bush and forest was a long and weary business. A couple of big and lumbering wagons of Dutch build sufficed to hold the belongings of the immigrants. Two pairs of oxen were harnessed to one wagon, and three pairs to the other, and these slow-moving beasts of burden, yoked together by their cumbrous collars of wood, drew the creaking wains at little more than snail pace. For cheerful variation, the little company had hymn or song; John Lawrence being especially lively in that direction, and often causing the staid Embury to arch his grey brows, as he listened to John's merry ditties, and much misdoubted whether they were just the thing for Methodists to sing.

THE DOOR OF THE HEART.

PASTOR Theodore Monod remarks: "There was a man, quite an infidel, who was dangerously ill, and a colporteur went to see him. The man would not receive him, and told him never to come again. The colporteur, after a few words, left the house; but he noticed that the man was very poor. Hence he went to the grocer's, and he sent provisions to the man. A little time after he went again. He was well received. The man said, 'If you please, sir, was it you who sent those provisions?' 'Well, yes, it was; but do not let us talk about that.' 'It was very kind of you. I treated you with so much discourtesy, and you were so good to me! My unbelieving friends, who profess to love me, have not done anything for me; but here you have sent me these provisions. Please read me some of your Book. He read to him, and visited him again and again. Before that man died he was brought to a knowledge of Christ. The work had been begun by an act of kindness." It is so in heathen lands. No door opens so quickly to the preacher of the Gospel as that which admits him in the character of the medical missionary.

A GRATEFUL PATIENT.

In the hospital established at Swatow, China, by the Medical Missionaries is a thankful patient. Her name is Gueh Ngo. She was cast off by her husband because of her diseased condition, and became a beggar, and lay sometime by the roadside outside the hospital gate. A rich man, a merchant in Swatow, took compassion on her and brought her to the hospital. Last year she became an applicant for church membership. She says, "Before I came to the hospital, I knew nothing of the doctrine. I was so wretched that I wished to die. Death when it comes will be better than I ever thought it, because my sins are forgiven. My future here I do not know, but I pray daily that God will open up my way for me. Formerly I cried almost constantly. Now I never cry; my heart is full of peace, I am so happy. Often I wake in the night, and thank God for all the hard way by which I have been led. I believe that but for my suffering, I should never have learned the way to heaven."

To the American People.

The Colorado Desert in Southern California is about to be watered.

A man of experience says: "Take no man's word on a matter of irrigation; there is too much money involved." On the other hand, men of the East do not know and cannot believe what wealth irrigation creates, and how quick it creates it, where all outdoors is a hotbed.

Between the two doubts, it takes some courage to speak of the profits about to be made. And yet you can see, from the yield of one acre, what a million acres is worth.

A thousand-million dollars is going to be created by the Colorado Desert Canal within ten years, if all goes well—most of it for settlers; a hundred-million for our stockholders.

You can take part with us in the general work immediately; or, later, buy ten acres of land and grow oranges lemons figs etc. The largest and quickest returns will come from fruit-growing. Settlers will get their money out of the ground before they pay us much for land and water.

We have a pamphlet to send you; free. Our immediate object is to sell shares. We shall sell shares slowly till ready for settlers, then turn to water and land. The price, to begin with, is $50; but at this price our whole stock would bring only $7,500,000. We shall sell no faster than money is needed to pay for the work, and no more than enough to take the canal to where we begin to irrigate; keeping sales back by raising the price. We suppose a $50 share will be worth $1,000, when half the desert is irrigated; $100 this year.

Within three months from receiving water, the settlers will be sending to New York and Chicago car-loads of vegetables at $50 to $150 an acre a year. In two or three years the fruit-trees bear. In fifteen years they yield $500 to $2,500 an acre a year, and are worth $2,000 to $10,000 an acre.

You think these figures too big. They are not; you shall see they are not. If it takes you a year to see it, you lose by your slowness. We shall do our part.

There is a million acres of Mediterranean fruit and nut land under our levels; barren now, because dry; but, with water, quick; and the lay of the land is such that the water will run all over it naturally.

The combination of climate, soil, transportation to market, water, and other favoring circumstances, exists in no other place in the world. Our settlers will have a monopoly of it. Name one other place—it does not exist. We own 1,500,000 acres outside of this—no railroad, no market.

The best measure of what will be done in the Colorado Desert is what is done in the adjoining valley 150 miles beyond; but our climate is warmer and dryer, our season four to six weeks earlier, soil as good, situation better, all the circumstances so favorable that we shall excel and surpass what is done in any other part of Southern California.

Everything else but water is there already. Water we take, without dam, from the Colorado River. The water is muddy, and soil improves under cultivation with it, without any other fertilizer; no other will ever be used apparently.

If water turns desert to garden, producing $50 to $150 an acre immediately, and ten times more when trees are half-grown, is it strange that the business of bringing water is profitable?

But the business is new to you in the East. We look to you for money to make the canal; we must make you acquainted with what is going on in a dozen valleys in Southern California. Farming is, almost everywhere, hard and slow; but fruit-growing there is easy, and vegetables provide the trees. We shall have no land or water to sell for a year. Meantime, get ready by reading about irrigation.

To save money, we shall make our advertisements short. In a month you will see what we mean; in a year we hope to be acquainted with you.

Write for the pamphlet.

HELPING THE INDUSTRIAL FARM.

MR. W. M. F. ROUND, Director of the Burnham Industrial Farm, at Canaan Four Corners, N. Y., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows: The article which you published about the Industrial Farm has brought us many friends. Among the subscriptions that have come was one that came with the enclosed unsigned letter. I have not been able to acknowledge it personally as there was no clue to the writer except the initials "S. M." in the corner of the envelope. The letter is as follows:

K. C., Mo., Feb. 23, 1893.

Mr. Round, Dear Sir. I saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the good work you are doing for the boys of New York, so I send the money I have saved for the past two or three years to you, for you to use as you see best. I have broken all the commandments and sinned against God and man, but I thank God he sent a Saviour of souls to our city, and I thank God for the peace of salvation and everlasting life through Jesus. I pray that these one hundred and fifty dollars will do the work of thousands. Give my love to the boys. I am only nineteen years old and work for my living, but God is with me and he has saved me. Glory to his name! Amen.

ARE YOU COMING TO THE WORLD'S FAIR?

If So, Where do You Expect to Sleep While Here? That is a Big Question and Don't You Forget it.

THE AVERAGE daily attendance at the Centennial Exposition was 8 exhibitors and their employees, 11,411 visitors, 62,293. At the Paris Exposition visitors, 137,251. At the Columbian Exposition next summer, there will be an average daily attendance of 8,000 exhibitors and their employees, and conservative estimates place the average daily attendance of visitors at 200,000, while many expect an average attendance of double that number. Where do you expect to sleep while in Chicago attending the World's Fair next summer? Chicago will be able to "eat" all who come without trouble, but to "sleep" these immense crowds is the problem. Take a word of advice from a friend.

ENGAGE A CORNER IN WHICH TO SLEEP BEFORE YOU COME.

Our Organization The World's Fair Temperance Encampment Association has been organized to furnish entertainment during the World's Fair to Temperance men and their families and friends at the lowest possible cost. The capital stock of this Association was at first $10,000, but such a rush of business has come to us that it has now been increased to $50,000. The personnel of this Association is as follows:

Our Location The Encampment grounds are located in the southern part of the city, near the World's Fair Grounds, on the corner of Indiana Ave. and 57th St. a little over six miles from the Court House. Our facilities for getting "somewhere" and back again are the very best. The State Street cable cars are only three blocks west of us, while the Cottage Grove Avenue cable cars are just across the Park east of us, and the elevated road, which is half way between these two lines, runs within ten feet of the east line of our Encampment Grounds. Either of these roads will take you to the city or to the Fair Grounds for only a nickel. Our grounds are near enough to the Fair Grounds to enable any good walker who wishes to save his nickels to walk back and forth without trouble.

We are in the Prohibition District, which means no saloons and no saloon rowdyism near our grounds. There is nothing whatever to call the bum element to our locality. Three of the most important railroad lines that enter Chicago have stations within a half-mile of the Encampment Grounds, while a dozen others, more or less, have stations only a little farther away. No finer location could have been selected.

OUR TENTS.

GOOD WORDS Your enterprise, wisely conducted, will prove a source of real benefit and convenience to a large constituency of temperance people.

CAPT. J. F. CLEGHORN, Clinton, Wis.

Your plan should, and doubtless will, be readily accepted and highly appreciated by thousands of people in moderate circumstances. It will check the exorbitant domands that the public must encounter from the hotel men of Chicago during the World's Fair. CAPT. D. H. HARTS.

Lincoln, Ill.

I have known Mr. J. A. Van Fleet for many years, and am so favorably impressed with his energy and ability to bring things to pass that, though I am not familiar with the details of his plan for furnishing entertainment at the World's Fair, I gladly commend Mr. Van Fleet to the favorable consideration of all Prohibitionists who may propose to attend the Fair. I am confident that whatever he undertakes to do he will do with energy and success.

Ex Whitelaw Reid Comments.

I know all the parties who compose the World's Fair Temperance Encampment Association, and regard them as honorable, upright Christian gentlemen. They undoubtedly have not only the disposition but also the financial ability to fulfil all their promises to those who engage quarters in the Encampment. WM. F. SINGLETON, Pres. Total Abstinence Life Ass'n.

YOUNG LADIES Parties of young ladies who may desire to leave the Fair unattended by gentlemen, will be assigned to special quarters set apart for that purpose. The motherly matron of the Encampment grounds will take particular pains to look after all such, and render them any assistance in her power. Large numbers of ladies unattended by gentlemen have already engaged tents in our Encampment.

A NICKEL "Only a nickel" will take you from the Encampment to almost any Depot, Church, Theater, Park, Panorama, Museum and public building in the city, or exposition. Don't allow yourselves to fall into the hands of hack-drivers. If you do you will be thereof. As soon as later date we will send free to all our patrons full information on all these points.

OUR GROUNDS.

SOIL.—We are on a light, sandy soil, where a mud hole is an impossibility.

SHADE.—We are in a delightful grove of young oaks, with a good many additional acres of grove near us, and Washington Park, with its fine driveways, its splendid flower gardens, its grateful shade and its beautiful artificial lakes and sparkling fountains, all free to the public, only a block and a half away.

FENCE.—Our grounds are surrounded by a high, tight fence, with gates through which only those who hold our tickets, or are fully vouched for by responsible parties, will be permitted to pass.

LIGHT.—Brilliant electric lights will be placed in every part of our grounds.

POLICE.—Uniformed police will be on duty day and night. The best known thief-taker in the West, a man who knows a thief at first sight, and who commands a salary of nearly $100 per week, will be in charge.

RESTAURANT The restaurant will furnish meals and lunches as cheap as they can be bought in Chicago and as good. A good cup of coffee can be had for Five Cents, and doughnuts, rolls, sandwiches, etc., etc., at proportionate rates. If these prices do not suit, there will be no law against going to the thousand or more other restaurants that will be near.

For sanitary reasons no cooking will be allowed in the tents, but there will be no objection to the use of an oil or alcohol stove for making tea and coffee.

REUNION OF FRIENDS The Encampment Association will arrange for a vast number of "family" and "friendship" reunions during the World's Fair. To illustrate: A family of half a dozen, more or less, brothers and sisters, are scattered, perhaps, in as many different states, and are heads of as many different families. Possibly they have not seen each other for years. All of them will desire to visit the World's Fair. We invite them all to come at the same time, and will locate them in adjacent tents, where they may remain as long as they desire, visiting, attending the World's Fair, and having a good time generally. If any friends who happen to to read these lines would like such a reunion of his or her relatives, we suggest: 1. Send us the names and addresses of such friends, and we will send them information about the plan.

2. Having done this, write each one of them a letter telling them what you want and urging them to co-operate. They will be glad to do it, and will thank you for making the suggestion. Try it and see.

TRUNKS AND VALISES Our charges for transporting trunks and valises to and from the Encampment Grounds will be as follows: Any depot in the central part of the city, trunks, 50c.; valises, 25c. Any depot south of 39th St., and east of Halsted St., trunks, 25c.; valises, 15c. These prices are less than half what the city transfer men will probably charge you. Bring your checks directly to the Encampment, and we will do the rest.

THE DIFFERENCE.

HEALING AND TEACHING IN CHINA.

Dr. John G. Kerr's Forty Years' Labor as Chief of the Medical Staff of the Hospital of Canton—Medical Service the Road to the Chinese Heart.

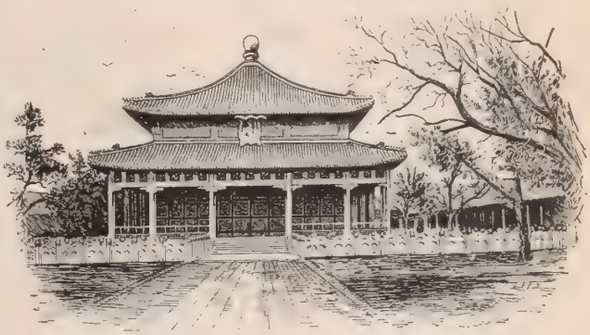
ALL experience of recent years in the foreign mission field has demonstrated no fact more clearly than that of the efficient aid which medical knowledge renders to the propagation of the Gospel. In China, especially, has the value of this aid been conspicuous. It has been said that the pioneer American medical missionary, Dr. Parker, opened China to Gospel preaching by the point of his lancet.

The prejudice which an ancient civilization naturally engenders against modern teachers whom it regards as barbarians, does not easily yield to argument; but when the barbarian has succeeded in saving life or relieving suffering, the prejudice against his teaching is apt to vanish. Even when the patient does not become a convert, he becomes a friend. Many a missionary, venturing out into some unopened district to preach the Gospel there for the first time, and having to face a hostile Chinese mob has been surprised to find some Chinaman, who is a perfect stranger to him, take him by the hand and lead him to his house, protecting him from his assailants, and giving him food and shelter. The Chinaman may not be a Christian, but he has been in the Christian Hospital at Canton, or some other Christian hospital, or has been treated by a Christian physician, and he befriends the preacher out of gratitude. There are now, scattered throughout China, about sixty institutions for the treatment of the sick and injured, which have been established through the efforts of the American and English missionary societies, and the patients treated there are to be found in every Chinese town and in all ranks of society.

The missionary hospital at Canton is the oldest of these institutions. It has been established nearly fifty-eight years and it is now broadening out into a medical college from which native Christian physicians are graduated and sent out thoroughly trained for the double service of preaching and healing. We have much pleasure in publishing on this page a picture, reproduced from a photograph, of a group of these graduates, in the centre of which are Dr. John G. Kerr, the chief of the hospital staff and principal of the College and Dr. Mary W. Niles who is at the head of the female department. Dr. Kerr is a native of the State of Ohio and a graduate of Jefferson College, Philadelphia. He has been engaged in medical work in China for forty years and has had charge of the hospital for thirty-eight years. His colleague, Dr. Niles, is the daughter of a Presbyterian clergyman at Hornellsville, N. Y. She has been the lady physician at the hospital for more than ten years. Dr. Kerr, who is now in this country for a brief period of rest and recuperation after his long period of service, speaks in the highest terms of the intelligence of these students. They are, he says, devoted to their studies, are quick to learn and have the mental qualities necessary for their work. Several of them are accomplished linguists. The one whose portrait appears on Dr. Kerr's left in the group has a thorough knowledge of English and has translated into Chinese several medical text-books.

DR. J. G. KERR, DR. MARY W. NILES AND GRADUATES OF CANTON HOSPITAL.

There is no country in which the difference in social rank is so clearly marked by a difference in mental equipment as in China. The American who goes there with his ideas of Chinese character formed on the specimens of the race he has seen here soon realizes the necessity of correcting those ideas. He finds there ignorance and degradation lower than he had conceived; but he finds, too, intelligence and refinement much higher than his conception. The mental disparity between the American hoodlum and the American gentleman is slight in comparison with the mental disparity between the same extremes of Chinese society.



THE HALL OF THE CLASSICS, PEKING.

Apart from the distinctively religious work, which, of course, is the main object of the medical missionary in China, the actual direct benefit of the medical service has been inestimable. The practice of medicine by the native physician before the advent of the foreigner was purely empirical. There were no native colleges for medical teaching. The young man who proposes to devote himself to the medical profession is generally the son of a physician who picks up his knowledge from his father, or from the physician to whom he goes as a pupil. There is absolutely no knowledge of medicine or of the nature of drugs, and the prescriptions which they write are such as would amaze and amuse an American dispenser. They have great faith in the virtues of the fossil bones of tigers, petrified crabs, pearls and deers' horns, while powdered dragons teeth often figure among the ingredients of a mixture. They have no idea of the true nature of disease, and it is by no means uncommon to hear a native physician gravely ascribe an epidemic or a single case of disease to a disturbance of the equilibrium between the yam and the yueng, the universally prevalent male and female powers of nature. The influence of the planets, of evil spirits, and of spiteful men are all, in the opinion of Chinese physicians, potent causes of physical maladies. But it is in cases where surgical skill and knowledge is demanded that the Chinese practitioner most miserably breaks down. He has no idea of the method of controlling bleeding, so dare not use the knife, even to remove a tumor. It follows that all cases in which surgical skill can do so much to save life or relieve pain, must be maltreated or run their course to the death of the patient.

The Tabernacle Pulpit

SUBJECT: "A BROOKLYN PASTORATE."

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Rev. 4: 4. "And round about the throne were four and twenty seats, and upon the seats I saw four and twenty elders."

THIS text I choose chiefly for the numerals it mentions, namely four and twenty. That was the number of elders seated around the throne of God. But that is the number of years seated around my Brooklyn ministry, and every pulpit is a throne of blessing or blasting, a throne of good or evil. And to-day in this my twenty-fourth anniversary sermon, twenty-four years come and sit around me, and they speak out in a reminiscence of gladness and tears. Twenty-four years ago I arrived in this city to shepherd such a flock as might come, and that day I carried in on my arms the infant son who in two weeks from to-day I will help ordain to the gospel ministry hoping that he will be preaching long after my poor work is done.

We have received into our membership thousands of souls, but they I think are only a small portion of the multitudes who, coming from all parts of the earth, have in our house of God been blest, and saved. Although we have as a church raised a million and one hundred thousand dollars for religious purposes, yet we are in the strange position of not knowing whether in two or three months we shall have any church at all, and with audiences of thousands of people crowded into this room and the adjoining rooms, we are confronted with the question whether I shall go on with my work here or go to some other field. What an awful necessity that we should have been obliged to build three immense churches, two of them destroyed by fire.

A misapprehension is abroad that the financial exigency of this church is past. Through journalistic and personal friends a breathing spell has been afforded us, but before us yet are financial obligations which must promptly be met or speedily this house of God will go into worldly uses, and become a theatre or a concert hall. The $12,000 raised cannot cancel a floating debt of $140,000. Through the kindness of those to whom we are indebted, $60,000 would set us forever free. I am glad to say that the case is not hopeless. We are daily in receipt of touching evidences of practical sympathy from all classes of the community and from all sections of the country and it was but yesterday that by my own hand I sent, for contributions gratefully received, nearly fifty acknowledgments East, West, North, and South.

Our trust is in the Lord who divided the [illegible] like lambs." With this paragraph I dismiss the financial subject, and return to the spiritual. This morning the greatness of God's kindness obliterates everything, and if I wanted to build a groan, I do not know in what forest I would hew the timber, or from what quarry I would dig the foundation-stone, or who would construct for me an organ with a tremolo for the only stop; and so this morning I occupy my time in building one great massive, high, deep, broad, heaven-piercing hallelujah. In the review of the last twenty-four years I think it may be useful to consider some of the characteristics of a Brooklyn pastorate.

In the first place, I remark that a Brooklyn pastorate is always a difficult pastorate. No city under the sun has a grander array of pulpit talent than Brooklyn. The Methodists, the Baptists, the Congregationalists, the Episcopalians, all the denominations send their brightest lights here. He who stands in any pulpit in Brooklyn, preaching, may know that he stands within fifteen minutes' walk of sermons which a Saurin, and a Bourdaloue, and a John M. Mason, and a George Whitefield would not be ashamed of. No city under the sun where a poor sermon is such a drug on the market.

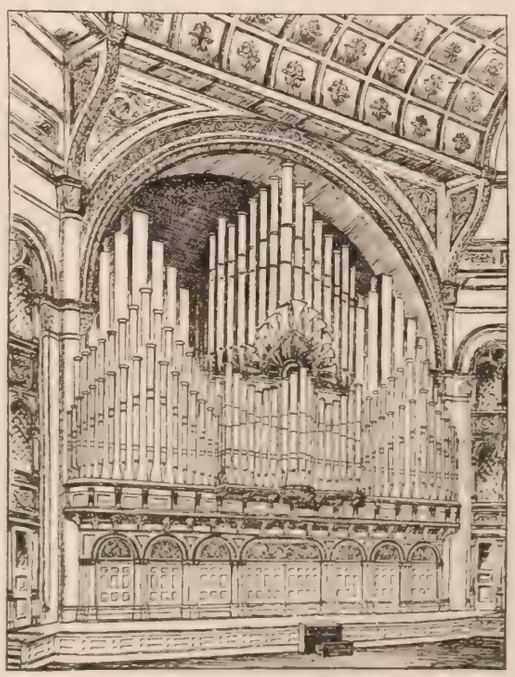
For forty years Brooklyn has been surcharged with homiletics, an electricity of eloquence that struck every time it flashed, from the old pulpits which quaked with the powers of a Bethune, and a Cox, and a Spencer, and a Spear, and a Vinton, and a Farley, and a Beecher, not mentioning the names of the magnificent men now manning the Brooklyn pulpits. So during all the time there has been something to appeal to every man's taste, and to gratify every man's preference.

Now, let me say to all ministers of the Gospel who are ambitious for a Brooklyn pulpit, that it is always a difficult pastorate. If a man shall come and stand before any audience in almost any church in Brooklyn, he will find before him men who have heard the mightest themes discussed in the mightiest way. You will have before you, if you fail in an argument, fifty logicians in a fidget. If you make a slip in the use of a commercial figure of speech, there will be five hundred merchants who will notice it. If you throw out an anchor or furl a sail in the wrong way, there will be ship captains right off who will wonder if you are as ignorant of theology as you are of navigation! So it will be a place of hard study. If you are going to maintain yourself, you will find a Brooklyn pastorate a difficult pastorate.

I remark still further, a Brooklyn pastorate is always a conspicuous pastorate. The printing-press of the country has no greater force than that on the sea-coast. Every pulpit word, good or bad, wise or ignorant, kind or mean, is watched. The reportorial corps of these cities is an organized army. Many of them have collegiate education and large culture, and they are able to weigh oration, or address, or sermon. If you say a silly thing you will never hear the end of it, and if you say a wise thing it will go into perpetual multiplication. There is no need of decrying that fact. The newspaper is the pulpit on the wing. More preaching done on Monday than on Sunday. The omnivorous, all-eyed printing-press is ever vigilant.

Besides that, a Brooklyn pastorate is always conspicuous in the fact that everybody comes here. Brooklyn is New York in its better mood! Strangers have not seen New York until they have seen Brooklyn. The East River is the chasm in which our merchants drop their cares and their anxieties and their business troubles, and by the time they have greeted their families in the home circle, they have forgotten all about Wall Street and Broadway and the shambles. If they commit business sins in New York during the day, they come over to Brooklyn to repent of them!

Everybody comes here. Stand at the bridge entrance or at the ferry gates on Sabbath morning at 10 o'clock, or Sabbath evening at 7 o'clock, and you see



The Great Organ in The Brooklyn Tabernacle.

North, South, East, West—Europe, Asia, Africa, New Zealand, Australia—coming to Brooklyn to spend the Sabbath, or part of it in the persons of their representatives. Some of them fresh from the sea. They have just landed, and they want to seek the house of God publicly to thank the Lord for their deliverance from cyclone and fog-banks off Newfoundland. Every song sung, every prayer offered, every sermon preached in New York and Brooklyn, and all along this sea-coast, in some shape goes all round the world. A Brooklyn pastorate is at the greatest altitude of conspicuity.

Again I remark, that a Brooklyn pastorate is characterized by brevity. I bethink myself of but three ministers of the Gospel now preaching here, who were preaching when I came to Brooklyn. Most of the pulpits around me have changed seven or eight times since my arrival.

Sometimes the pastorate has been brief for one reason, and sometimes for another reason. Sometimes the ministers of the Gospel have been too good for this world, and Heaven has transplanted them. Sometimes they changed places by the decree of their denomination. Sometimes they came with great blare of trumpets, proposing to carry everything before them, and got extinguished before they were distinguished! Some got preached out in two or three years, and told the people all they knew! Some with holy speed did in a short time work which it takes a great many years to do.

Whether for good or bad reasons, a Brooklyn pastorate is characterized by brevity; not much of the old plan by which a minister of the Gospel baptized an infant, then received him into the church, after he had become an adult married him, baptized his children, married them, and lived on long enough to bury almost everybody but himself. Glorious old pastorates they were. Some of us remember them—Dr. Spring, Peter Labaugh, Dominie Zabriskie, Daniel Waldo, Abram Halsey. When the snow melted from their foreheads it revealed the flowers of an unfading coronal. Pastorates of thirty, forty, fifty, fifty-five years continuance. Some of them had to be helped into the pulpit or into the carriage, they were so old and decrepit; but when the Lord's chariots halted one day in front of the old parsonage, they stepped in vigorous as an athlete, and as we saw the wheels of fire whirling through the gates of the sunset we all cried out, "My father, my father! the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof."

I remark again: a Brooklyn pastorate is characterized by its happiness.

No city under the sun where people take such good care of their ministers. In proportion as the world outside may curse, a congregation stands close up by the man whom they believe in. Brooklyn society has for its foundation two elements—the Puritanic which always means a quiet Sabbath; and the Hollandish, which means a worshipful people. On the top of this an admixture of all nationalities—the brawny Scot, the solid English, the vivacious Irish, the polite French, the philosophic German; and, in all this intermingling of population, the universal dominant theory that a man can do as he pleases, provided he doesn't disturb anybody else.

A delightful climate. While it is hard on weak throats, for the most of us it is bracing. Not an atmosphere made up of the discharged gases of chemical factories, or the miasms of swamps, but coming panting right off three thousand miles of Atlantic Ocean before anybody else has had a chance to breathe it! All through the city a society of kind, genial, generous, sympathetic people. How they fly to you when you are in trouble. How they watch over you when you are sick. How tender they are with you when you have buried your dead. Brooklyn is a good place to live in, a good place to die in, a good place to be buried in, a good place from which to rise in the beautiful resurrection.

In such a city I have been permitted to have twenty-four years of pastorate. During these years how many heartbreaks, how many losses, how many bereavements! Hardly a family of the church that has not been struck with sorrow. But God has sustained you in the past, and he will sustain you in the future. I exhort you to be of good cheer, O thou of the broken heart. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." I wish over every door of this church we might have written the word "sympathy." Sympathy for all the young.

We must crowd them in here by thousands, and propose a radiant Gospel that they will take on the spot. We must make this place so attractive for the young that a young man man will come here on Sabbath morning, put down his hat, brush his hair back from his forehead, unbutton his overcoat, and look around, wondering if he has not by mistake got into heaven. He will see in the faces of the old people, not the gloom which some people take for religion, but the sunshine of celestial peace, and he will say, "Why, I wonder if that isn't the same peace that shone out on the face of my father and mother when they lay dying?" And then there will come a dampness in his eyes through which he can hardly see, and he will close his eyes to imprison the emotion; but the hot tear will break through the fringes of eyelashes and drop upon the coat-sleeve. He will put his head on the back of the pew in front and sob, "Lord God of the old people, help me!" We ought to lay a plot here for the religious capture of all the young people in Brooklyn.

Yes, sympathy for the old. They have their aches and pains and distresses. They cannot hear or walk or see as well as they used to. We must be reverential in their presence. On dark days we must help them through the aisle, and help them find the place in the hymn-book. Some Sabbath morning we shall miss them from their place, and we shall say, "Where is Father So-and-so to-day?" and the answer will be, "What, haven't you heard? The King's wagons have taken Jacob up to the palace where his Joseph is yet alive."

Sympathy for business men. Twenty-four years of commercial life in New York and Brooklyn are enough to tear one's nerves to pieces. We want to make our Sabbath service here a rescue for all these martyrs of traffic, a foretaste of that land where they have no rents to pay, and there are no business rivalries, and where riches, instead of taking wings to fly away, brood over other riches.

Sympathy for the fallen, remembering that they ought to be pitied as much as a man run over with a rail-train. The fact is that, in the temptations and misfortunes of life, they get run over. You and I, in the same circumstances, would have done as badly; we should have done worse, perhaps. If you and I had the same evil surroundings, and the same evil parentage that they had, and the same native-born proclivities to evil that they had, you and I should have been in the penitentiary, or outcasts of society. "No," says some self-righteous man, "I couldn't have been overthrown in that way." You old hypocrite, you would have been the first to fall!

We want in this church to have sympathy for the worst man, remembering he is a brother; sympathy for the worst woman, remembering she is a sister. If that is not the Gospel, I do not know what the Gospel is. Ah! yes; sympathy for all the troubled; for the orphans in their exposure; for widowhood with its weak arm fighting for bread; for the household which erst resounded with merry voices and pattering feet, now awfully still—broad-winged sympathy, like the feathers of the Almighty—warm-blooded sympathy, everlasting sympathy—sympathy which shows itself in the grasp of the hand, in the glittering tear of the eye, in the consoling word of the mouth—sympathy of blankets for the cold, of bread for the hungry, of medicine for the sick, of rescue for the lost. Sympathy!

Let it thrill in every sermon. Let it tremble in every song. Let it gleam in every tear and in every light. Sympathy! Men and women are sighing for sympathy, groaning for sympathy, dying for sympathy, tumbling off into uncleanliness and crime and perdition for lack of sympathy. May God give it to us! Fill all this pulpit with it, from step to step. Let the sweep of these galleries suggest its encircling arms. Fill all the house with it, from door to door, and from floor to ceiling, until there is no more room for it, and it shall overflow into the street, and passer-by on foot and in carriage shall feel the throb of its magnificent benediction. Let that be our new departure as a church. Let that be my new departure as a pastor. Sympathy! Gratitude to God demands that this morning I mention the fact that during all these twenty-four years I have missed but one service through sickness. When I entered the ministry I was so delicate I did not think I would preach three months; but preaching has agreed with me, and I think the healthiest thing in all the earth is the religion of Jesus Christ. Bless the Lord, O, my soul! What ingrates we are in regard to our health.

I must, in gratitude to God, also mention the multitudes to whom I have been permitted to preach. It is simply miraculous, the attendance morning by morning, night by night, and year by year, and long after it has got to be an old story. I know some people are dainty and exclusive in their tastes. As for myself, I like a big crowd. I would like to see an audience large enough to scare me! If this Gospel is good, the more that get it the better.

Many have received the Gospel here, but others have rejected it. Now, I tell you what I am going to do with some of my dearest friends who have hitherto rejected the Gospel. You are not afraid of me, and I am not afraid of you, and some day, Oh brother, I will clasp your hands together, and I will turn your face the other way, and I will take hold of your shoulders, and while you are helpless in my grasp I will give you one headlong push into the kingdom of God. Christ says we must compel you to come in; I will compel you to come in. Can I consent to anything else with these men, who are as dear to me as my own soul? I will compel you to come in.

THESE MEMORIALS WERE BROUGHT BY REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE IN 1889 FROM THE HOLY LANDS AND PRESENTED TO THIS CHURCH.

THE FOUR MEMORIAL STONES.
Brought from Holy Land by Dr. Talmage and interred in the wall of the Tabernacle.

Profiting by the mistakes of the past, I must do better work for you and better work for God. Lest I might, through some sudden illness or casualty, be snatched away before I have the opportunity of doing so, I take this occasion to declare my love for you as a people. It is different work if a pastor is placed in a church already built up, and he is surrounded by established circumstances. There are not ten people in this church that have not been brought into the church through my ministry. You are my family. I feel as much at home here as I do in my residence on Oxford street. You are my family—my father, my mother, my sister, my son, my daughter. You are my joy and crown, the subject of my prayers.

Your present and everlasting welfare is the object of my ambition. I have no worldly ambition. I had once. I have not now. I know the world about as well as any one knows it. I have heard the handclapping of its applause, and I have heard the hiss of its opposition, and I declare to you that the former is not especially to be sought for, nor is the latter to be feared. The world has given me about all the comfort and prosperity it can give a man, and I have no worldly ambition. I have an all-consuming ambition to make full proof of my ministry, to get to heaven myself, and to take a great crowd with me. Upon your table and cradle, and armchair, and pillow, and lounge, and nursery, and drawing-room, and kitchen, may the blessing of the Almighty God come down!

During these twenty-four years there is hardly a family that has not been invaded by sorrow or death. Where are those grand old men, those glorious Christian women who used to worship with us? Why, they went away into the next world so gradually that they had concluded the second stanza or the third stanza in Heaven before you knew they were gone. They had on the crown before you thought they had dropped the staff of the earthly pilgrimage.

And then the dear children. O! how many have gone out of this church. You could not keep them. You folded them in your arms and said: "O! God, I cannot give them up. Take all else, take my property, take my reputation, but let me keep this treasure. Lord, I cannot bear this," O! if we could all die together, if we could keep all the sheep and the lambs of the family fold together until some bright spring day, the birds achant and the waters aglitter, and then we could altogether hear the voice of the good Shepherd, and hand in hand pass through the flood. No, no, no, no! O! if we only had notice that we are all to depart together, and we could say to our families, "The time has come. The Lord bids us away." And then we could take our little children to their beds, and straighten out their limbs, and say: "Now, sleep the last sleep. Good night, until it is good morning." And then we could go to our own couches, and say: "Now, altogether we are ready to go. Our children are gone, now let us depart." No, no! It is one by one. It may be in the midnight. It may be in the winter, and in the snow coming down twenty inches deep over our grave. It may be in the strange hotel, and our arm, too weak to pull the bell for help. It may be so suddenly we have no time even to say good-by. Death is a bitter, crushing, tremendous curse.

I play you three tunes on the Gospel harp of comfort. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." That is one. "All things work together for good to those who love God." That is the second. "And the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe all tears from their eyes." That is the third. During these twenty-four years I have tried as far as I could, by argument, by illustration, and by caricature, to fill you with disgust with much of this modern religion which people are trying now to substitute for the religion of Jesus Christ and the religion of the apostles. I have tried to persuade you that the worst of all cant is the cant of scepticism, and instead of your apologizing for Christianity, it was high time that those who do not believe in Christianity should apologize to you; and I have tried to show that the biggest villains in the universe are those who would try to rob us of this Bible, and that the grandest mission of the Church of Jesus Christ is that of bringing souls to the Lord—a soul-saving church.

When a woman was dying, she said, "Call them back." They did not know what she meant. She had been a disciple of the world. She said, "Oh, call them back!" They said, "Who do you want us to call back? "Oh," she said, "call them back, the days, the months, the years I have wasted. Call them back!" But you cannot call them back; you cannot call a year back, or a month back, or a week back, or an hour back, or a second back. Gone once, it is gone forever.

When a great battle was raging, a messenger came up and said to the general, who was talking with an officer. "General, we have taken a standard from the enemy." The general kept right on conversing with his fellow-officer, and the messenger said again, "General, we have taken a standard from the enemy." Still the general kept right on, and the messenger lost his patience, not having his message seemingly appreciated, and said again, "General, we have taken a standard from the enemy." The general then looked at him and said, "Take another." Ah! forgetting the things that are behind, let us look to those that are before. Win another castle, take another standard, gain another victory.

Roll on, sweet day of the world's emancipation, when "the mountains and the hills shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the wood shall clap their hands, and instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier will come up the myrtle-tree, and it shall be unto the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that cannot be cut off."

A REQUEST FROM ERZEROOM.

A LETTER from Mr. D. A Richardson, Missionary, American Board, Erzeroom, Asia Minor, received by The Christian Herald, says: "The Christian Herald reaches even this remote corner of Asia Minor, in the mountains of Ararat. One of our young men, a graduate of our High School, for some years a teacher therein and a rising photographer, Mr. Mozes Papazian, has subscribed for it, and our High School Teacher, Mr. Mompre Gagossian, has done likewise. These subscriptions I have forwarded. I have long been looking for a Christian paper which should be helpful and elevate plain people. The Christian Herald is just the paper I have been looking for. And this what I want it for—We have a good many young men, educated either in our High School or in the College at Herpoot, whose tastes are formed for good reading, and who can understand plain English, and their vernacular literature is too scanty to satisfy them. But they are nearly all poor. Our preachers and teachers get salaries ranging from $4 to $15 a month, mostly under $7, and many must support families on these stipends. The past year there has been a near approach to famine, which has sent expenses up so that they find it hard to live. The Christian Herald is out of the reach of many of these preachers who would be greatly benefitted by it. Would it be possible for you to recommend to some of your well-to-do readers to pay for subscriptions to some of these young men? Here are the names of four who would be greatly benefitted by the paper, but who can't pay for it:

Yeranik Der Stepanian, Kars, Russia.
Zaharia Sarmasian, Erzeroom, Russia.
Mattes Pilibian, Kharpoot, European Turkey.
Mekhitar Kevorkian, Erzegan, Turkey.

If any of our friends are disposed to undertake this commendable work, The Christian Herald will be sent for a year to any of the addresses given by Mr. Richardson for $1 and $1 additional for foreign postage.

THE VALUE OF WISDOM.

S. S. Lesson for May 7. Prov. 3: 11-24 Golden Text, Prov. 3 : 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

TRUST in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths." It was no man of weak intellect who wrote these words. "God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the sea shore. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east, and the wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all men . . . and his fame was in all nations round about . . . And there came of all people to hear the wisdom of Solomon from all kings of the earth which had heard of his wisdom." (I. Kings 4 : 29–34.) Such a man's testimony demands respect even from an earthly point of view. If any man might lean to his own understanding, surely the wisest among men might do so. But the very spring and essence of the wisdom of Solomon was his constant recognition of, and appeal to, the higher wisdom of God.

The ordinary idea, even of Christians, is to trust in the Lord when they can do nothing else; they go upon the principle of that uninspired and man-made proverb: "God helps those that help themselves;" and in this way God is made second instead of first. "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart;" not only after thou hast tried and failed, but before thou dost make trial of a thing. Abraham, Moses, David, and many other saints of God, inquired of the Lord before they took action, not after they had done the best to help themselves. They took God as the Ruler of their lives, not as an occasional counsellor to supplement their own faulty self-government. They trusted in the Lord with all their heart, and leaned not to their own understanding. The wise man shows how of body, prosperity in circumstances, advance in the school of joy and peace, and the absence of fear come out of that wisdom which fully trusts the Lord. To acknowledge the Lord in our hours of sleeping and waking, is to let him have the command; to let him wake us to commence the day with him when he wills, to rest for his work's sake and not for self-pleasing. To acknowledge the Lord in our work is to work, not under the pressure of our own self-importance, but in the consciousness that he, the Lord our Shepherd, could never give us anything to do for which he does not give us the time and strength. How often has a Christian worker begun the day with a weary sigh: "O, I have got so much to do; I can never get through it," and then leaning to his own understanding, he has tried to press into too little space important things which had to be done that time might be left for other things. Thus the brain has been overcharged, the nerves upon the strain, a sense of oppression and urgency upon the spirit, and a sense of slavery, as though it were too bad that so much should come upon one person in one day. The yoke is a very heavy one; how can it be lightened? "In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths." But I am expected to do all this, I am not a free agent, I cannot do as I like. Oh, how often this cry like that of Egytian bondage has come into our ears. Does the Lord know, hast thou told it all to him, discharged it all on him, so that the weighty burden rests no more on thee? He shall most surely direct thy paths. He will tell thee what thou must do, and give thee rest in doing it; he will tell thee what thou must leave, and justify thee in leaving it undone. Just the blessed conciousness that the Lord is responsible, rests the weary brain, takes all the strain out of the [illegible] and makes work a rest instead of a fatigue; and thus is fulfilled the word: "Let thine heart keep my commandments, for length of days and long life shall they add to thee." "They are life unto those that find them, and health to all their flesh." Whatever we do in quietude of mind, strengthens and rests us; while all that we do under hurry or strain, and with our minds on the next thing while we do it, wears and tries us and weakens us.

Prosperity.

"Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." What does a man generally do when he becomes rich? Does he double or treble his gifts to the missionary societies? Does he put his banking book down at the Master's feet, and say, Lord, I am but thy steward; all this is thine, tell me how I can honor thee with it? Or does he go into a larger house, buy more expensive furniture and pictures. Does he get a carriage, and give receptions, and try to get into higher society? Which does he do, does he serve himself, or honor the Lord with his substance? There is a wonderful power of reproduction in all which is really given to the Lord, given not to get honor or reputation as a benefactor, but from the truest, most loyal appreciation of the claims of God. Paul "suffered the loss of all things," but he could yet say: "I have all and abound." And even when God permits, for a time, that his trusting children shall come into straits, it is but an opportunity for his answer to prayer. Paul could say on God's behalf to those who had supplied his need: "My God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory by Jesus Christ."

Education.

"My son, despise not the chastening (or training) of the Lord; neither be weary of his correction; for whom the Lord loveth he correcteth even as a father the son in whom he delighteth." (R.V.) When a child of God comes to understand his heart, and really takes in that in his dispensations, God is not wantonly oppressing and tantalizing his children, in the sufferings, trials, temptations and testings through which he allows them to go;—but that he has a definite purpose of love in all,—then everything looks different. God maketh "all things work together for good to them that love him," to the end that we may be conformed to the image of his Son. All our schooling, all our trials, every moment of difficulty in our whole life is permitted and overruled to this end, that we may be made like Jesus. Does everything in the day seem to go crossways so that we are hindered, hemmed in, forced to leave what we felt most needful to do, misunderstood when our intentions were the purest? This is not the result of a tyranny on God's part which is pleased or amused to see his children suffer. No, it is a test as to whether we will indeed trust in the Lord with all our heart and at such moments, so acknowledge him and his reign in all things that he may "direct our paths." A quiet spirit, just when external things are the most aggravating, tells more for God than the most wonderfully eloquent discourses. The presence of the Lord with Joseph in Potiphar's house, and in the prison, proved to idolatrous Egypt that there was a living God.

Joy and Peace.

"Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding." The truly wise man is a happy man, he has no burdens for he has cast them on the Lord, no perplexities, for God directs him; he has not the anxiety of looking after an enormous property, he has turned it over to God. He does not lie awake from anxiety or look longingly at food for which he has no appetite; he has found the ways of God's wisdom "ways of pleasantness" and all her paths to be peace. "She is a tree of life to them that lay hold on her, and happy is every one that retaineth her." He deals with God and God deals with all else for him, so that nothing can touch him without his intervention; how then can he but be happy? God is more to him than all the world, and everything, whether it may appear good or bad brings him nearer to his God. The same God who "founded the earth" and "established the heavens" directs his little earthly life; surely he will be well cared for. And he shall not fear. There is a firmness, a consistency, in the walk of a man whose steps are ordered by the Lord. "Thou shalt walk in thy way safely, and thy foot shall not stumble." Even and sure are our goings when our goings are in God. And sure is our rest too: "When thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid; yea, thou shalt lie down and thy sleep shall be sweet." None sleep so sweetly as those who sleep at peace with God, with man, and with their own consciences. Another is on the watch for them, and he says: "Be not afraid of sudden fear, neither of the desolation of the wicked, when it cometh. For the Lord shall be thy confidence and shall keep thy foot from being taken."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE passage selected for the lesson is part of the preface or introduction to the main portion of the Book of Proverbs which occupies its first nine chapters. The author, evidently a man of noble spirit and cultivated mind, has set out to woo the young men of his day from unworthy pursuits to the study of wisdom and especially of the wisdom contained in the collection of maxims and adages which follows. Through these nine chapters, he is giving them cogent reasons for making the search after wisdom the main occupation of their lives. If, he tells them, it is happiness that they seek, they can find truer happiness in wisdom than in anything else. The wise man has more real enjoyment than the man of pleasure, has more real wealth than the rich man, and is a more useful citizen than the ambitious man. He pauses in his argument for a moment to guard them against mistake. They must not be surprised if they encounter trial. The prosperity and happiness which he has been promising them are merely incidental. They are not the object for which they seek. It is wisdom they are to seek and the way to it may lie through suffering. But they are not to be discouraged. They may even draw comfort and encouragement from their trial. Regarding it as God's discipline, they may infer that he is helping them and is taking unusual pains with their education, as a loving and wise father does with the training of a son from whom he expects great things. These sufferings are not to be despised nor to be endured with impatience. The result of them will be an advance in wisdom, and wisdom is the most precious of all things. This brings the author back to the main line of his argument and he proceeds to compare wisdom with the various prizes which are most esteemed.

More precious than rubies. To the Oriental mind the comparison was a strong one. The ruby has always been esteemed the most precious of gems. A famous jeweler of the present day says that a ruby of perfect color, weighing five carats is worth ten times as much as a diamond of equal weight. The larger the stone the greater is its proportionate value and rubies of exceptional size command enormous prizes. The largest ruby known in Europe is of the size of a small hen's egg. It was presented by Gustavus III. of Sweden to the Empress of Russia, on the occasion of his visit to St. Petersburg. A large one occupies the centre of the Maltese cross in the crown of Queen Victoria, but it is said to be imperfect. The greatest ruby in the world was that in the possession of the King of Ceylon, which, according to Marco Polo, was as thick as a man's arm and without a flaw. Kublai Khan sent an ambassador to him offering him the value of a city as a price for it, but the king would not sell it. It is not known what has become of it.

None of the things thou canst desire are to be compared to her. They do not give satisfaction as does true wisdom. In a society journal last fall was a significant interview with a lady at Long Branch, N. J., which showed that wealth and luxury may abound and yet their owner be discontented. "This lady," the interviewer said, "created a sensation with her diamonds, her dresses and her dogs. She had every luxury that such ladies prize. During her stay of over four weeks, she changed her toilet five times each day, and never appeared in the same dress twice during the entire time. She brought forty-eight trunks with her when she came, and express packages have arrived daily containing new articles of dress. She had five maids, each of whom is an artist in her individual line. She has over two hundred pairs of shoes and slippers, some of the latter embroidered with real pearls and thickly studded with precious stones of all colors." Thus the report goes on at great length. Yet she dropped sentences during the interview, revealing that all this did not satisfy her; and that she was even happier when in earlier life she was a poor girl hired out as a nurse.

That there are things more to be desired than gold and jewels some have learned by painful experience. A striking example is that quoted by Mr. Stead of the luckless King of Persia whom the Moslems shut up in his own treasury. There all around him, were heaped diamonds, rubies, pearls of inestimable value beside sacks of gold and silver. Wherever he turned he saw enormous wealth; yet in that room he perished of hunger and thirst.

Her ways are ways of pleasantness. A careless man, a reckless sinner, was arrested in the midst of his wild career of wickedness, and brought to repentance. By the great mercy of God he was converted, pardoned, and began to lead a new life. The great change of his habits excited the remarks of all his neighbors. Meeting with one of his old associates one day, the latter remarked, "I hear you have given up all your pleasures." "No," replied the other, calmly, "I never knew what pleasure was until now. And as I have tried the pleasures of sin and religion both, and you as yet have tried only one, I ought to be the better judge."

Thy foot shall not stumble. When a man is trusting God fully and has ceased to fret and worry believing that nothing has happened to him that God does not know of, he treads the path of life with lighter foot and firmer step for he has cast his burden on the Lord. Miss Sarah Smiley gives a graphic description of an experience of her own that illustrates this. She says: "In the summer of 1879 I descended the Rhigi with one of the most faithful of Swiss guides. Beyond the services of the day, he gave me, unconsciously, a lesson for life. His first care was to put my wraps and other burdens upon his shoulders. In doing so he called for all; but I chose to keep back a few for special care. I soon found them no little hindrance to the freedom of my movement; but still I would not give them up until my guide, returning to where I was resting for a moment, kindly but firmly demanded that I should give him everything but my alpenstock. Putting them with the utmost care upon his shoulders, he led the way. And now, with my freedom, I found that I could make double speed with double safety. Then a voice spake inwardly: 'O, foolish, wilful heart! hast thou, indeed, given up thy last burden? Thou hast no need to carry them,' and then, as I stepped from rock to rock down the steep mountainside, I said within myself: And ever thus will I follow Jesus, my Guide, my Burden-bearer. I will cast all my care upon him, for he careth for me."

When thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid. An aged Christian being near death was settling himself calmly to sleep, not knowing whether he would wake again in this world. He was asked if he was not afraid to go to sleep when he was so near death. "No," said he, "if I should not awake again I should be with the Lord, and if I should awake as usual, the Lord would be with me."

All her paths are peace. Those who walk in wisdom's paths enjoy inward peace and being inoffensive generally live in peace. Luther used to tell an incident of a Duke of Saxony who made war on a Bishop. The Bishop had the power to raise an army and the Duke fully expected that he would do so. He sent a friend to ascertain what preparation the Bishop was making. On his return the Duke asked him eagerly what had been done. The spy answered, "Oh, you may easily surprise him; he is doing nothing—making no preparation." "How is that?" asked the Duke. "What does he say?" The spy replied, "He says he will feed his flock, preach the Word, visit the sick and that as for this war he should commit the weight of it to God himself." "Then," said the Duke, "the devil may wage war against him, but I will not."

Thy sleep shall be sweet. When one asked Alexander how it was that he could sleep so soundly and securely in the midst of danger, he told them that Parmenio watched: he felt calm and content so long as he knew that Parmenio was watching. He who trusts in the wisdom and love of God has far more reason for calmness. He can say with David, "I will lay me down and sleep for thou Lord makest me to dwell in safety."

"The Tabernacle Must Stay."

Thousands of Loving Hands Reached out to Redeem it—The Emergency Fund Steadily Growing—Prayer-Consecrated Offerings Flowing in—The Fund nearly $15,000.

AY by day, the Emergency Fund for the redemption of the Brooklyn Tabernacle is steadily growing, each returning sunrise affording increased hope that the desired object may be attained and America's greatest Protestant Church saved from the desecration of being converted to secular uses. The prompt and hearty response to Dr. Talmage's appeal, indicates that the Christian people of this Union are resolved that the Tabernacle shall not go under the hammer, or pass into the hands of those who would convert it into a theatre or a concert hall. Many hundreds of persons, who have been spiritually nourished by the inspired discourses preached in the Tabernacle, have sent very gracious and encouraging words, giving assurance of a deep, fervent, conscientious interest in the effort to avert the impending disaster. Some have been misled by a statement which appeared in certain newspapers that the pressure had been relieved and the Tabernacle saved; but this was unhappily unfounded. Its extended publicity has doubtless been the means of causing delay on the part of many who would otherwise have forwarded their contributions, which they will now be in a position to do, as the need is urgent.

They Love the Tabernacle.

If evidence were asked to prove the love and sympathy that exist throughout the Union for the Tabernacle and its pastor, it is found in the flood of letters that has poured into the offices of The Christian Herald during the past week. They give forth no uncertain tone, but a confident and unshaken belief that the Almighty will take care of his own and will not permit the Tabernacle, after a generation of Christian usefulness to pass under secular control and become a playhouse. Many of the writers recall how Dr. Talmage's sermons in The Christian Herald have cheered and encouraged the closing years of some dear one, now passed away, or have been the means of turning themselves to a better life.

Others send with their contributions, fervent petitions that the embarrassment may be relieved and the hearts of the people opened, and almost all express their appreciation of the privilege of sharing in the blessing that accompanies such service. Among those who have heartily and liberally responded to the appeal are people representing well-nigh every station in life—business men, pastors, members of church societies, mission boards, and Endeavorers. Widows and orphans, too, have cast in their offerings, with a prayer that they might be multiplied for the extinction of the debt. Such a volume of supplication has ascended to the throne in behalf of the Tabernacle and its pastor from these friends, and many are so heartily supplementing their prayers with generous deeds, that the outlook grows more and more encouraging, and we look forward hopefully in the expectation that those prayers, breathed from the lips of Christian men and women, may soon be abundantly answered.

We give below a few extracts from some of the letters:

Some of the Letters.

Rev. C. S. Palmer, (of the Quinn-Palmer Anti-Gambling Crusade), writes from Toledo, Ohio:

Yesterday our thoughts were turned to Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle and the struggle that church is having just now. We felt drawn, even in our poverty, to take an offering for the church in which most of us had been privileged to worship at different times. The gift is very small, but it comes from those who know what it is to want for money to carry on a much-needed work. We hope that not only our own land may respond to the needs of the Tabernacle, but that the whole world may help, since Dr. Talmage is preaching to tens of thousands in every land.

B. G. Collins, Conway, S. C., $5. "Trust your appeal may evoke large liberality, and very soon free you from all embarrassment. God bless you."

F. A. Curtis, Providence, $5. "I wish Dr. Talmage to remain in Brooklyn and I hope the people do so, too."

Dora Wilson, Glens Falls, N. Y., $5. "If those that are so well able to give would only open their hearts and help, it would soon be accomplished. I think the world does not appreciate the good work of Dr. Talmage."

Mrs. Stella D. Zea, Rensselaer, Ind., $1. "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver. I would give $1,000 if I had it to give; but as I have not I will send a dollar willingly. It is my prayer that the amount will soon be raised."

D. H. Ross, Philadelphia, $2. "May God bless this offering, and put it into the hearts of very many to do likewise."

L. M. Welkon, Hillsborough, Can., $1. "May we ever be able to write you God bless you for your good work."

George C. Baum, Napoleon, O., $1. "If my little mite will do anything towards saving the church, I send it. God bless Dr. Talmage and keep him useful in the Master's cause."

A Mite and a Blessing.

B. F. Humphreys, Staunton, Va., $1. "It would be shameful to let a Christian church be turned to the devil's use. May God bless your efforts!"

"Humble Christian," Prairie City, Ind., 25 cents. "I pray to God to open the purses of the rich that his house may be saved and not given to the world and the devil. I send my mite to help save the Tabernacle. God will not put his people to shame. The money will come in as the birds came to the Israelites in the wilderness."

Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Landrum, $5. "We are poor ourselves and not able to give much; but if necessary we will remit again and again to help save the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Long live the cause of God in Brooklyn Tabernacle."

Charles and Esther Bartholomew, Mason City, Va., $1. "It comes from our hearts. We are old, and not blessed with a big lot of this world's goods; but what little we have got we are thankful for."

Charles Lindsay, Kenockee, Mo., $1. "May God assist you in this effort, and spare you to a ripe old age to preach in the Tabernacle."

Annie E Wampole, Eastern Pennsylvania, $2. "I sincerely wish it was $200,000 instead."

Residence of Cross River, Westchester Co., N. Y., $5. "We send our warmest sympathy for Dr Talmage. Jesus has favored us many times, and we hope you will accept our offering as coming from Him."

"Old Settler, Milwaukee, Wis., $1. "I have faith to believe that you will receive the desired sum. The cause is God's and must prevail."

Mr. and Mrs. Manypenny, Milford, Mich., $10. "I wish to tell you how much I have enjoyed your wonderful sermons, and have always thought you to be the greatest preacher since the time of Christ, Paul not excepted."

A Token of Gratitude.

J. H. Clark, Argusville, N. Y. "One good turn deserves another. Thirteen years ago you did me a good turn in the old Tabernacle. I went in there the first Sunday morning after my arrival in this country a stranger in a strange land and as homesick as could be. You offered such words of good cheer and encouragement that morning to just such as I, that I made up my mind to stay and persevere. From that day to this I have never regretted the decision, as prosperity has smiled on my efforts beyond anticipation, and now that have an opportunity of acknowledging the good turn received from you, and I am sure you deserve it."

E. D. Handford, Wakeman, O., $1. "God will bless a good cause and save his Tabernacle from the sheriff's hammer. Let every subscriber to The Christian Herald respond with a small amount, and the debt will be paid."

Annie F. Smith, Philadelphia, $2. "Hoping that the heavy load may soon be lifted that Dr. Talmage is now carrying."

W. Etheridge, Coalton, O., $1. "I pray that every Christian may help to pay the debt of the church, and do not believe that God will ever let it go for any other purpose than his house."

M. A. D, Bridgeport, Ct., $2. "With the prayer that our Heavenly Father will open the hearts of his children to give liberally, thereby securing to future generations a temple dedicated to his name, and which will be a lasting monument."

THE ENTHRONED INVALID.

THE heavenly distribution of spoils will be a surprise to many. Here enters heaven the soul of a man who took up a great deal of room in the church on earth, but there forsooth he is put in an old house once occupied by an angel who was hurled out of heaven at the time of Satan's rebellion.

Right after him comes a soul that makes a great stir among the celestials, and the angels rush to the scene, each bringing to her a dazzling coronet. Who is she? Over what realm on earth was she queen? In what great Dusseldorf festival was she the cantatrice? Neither. She was an invalid who never left her room for twenty years; but she was strong in prayer, and she prayed down revival after revival, and pentecost after pentecost, upon the churches, and with her pale hands she knit many a mitten or tippet for the poor, and with her contrivances she added joy to many a holiday festival, and now, with those thin hands so strong for kindness, and with those white lips so strong for supplication, she has won coronation and enthronement and jubilee. And Christ says to the angels who have brought each a crown for the glorified invalid, "No, not these; they are not good enough. But there is one that I have been preparing for her many a year, and for her every pang I have set an amethyst, and for her every good deed I have set a pearl. Fetch it now and fulfil the promise I gave her long ago in the sick room, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown.'"

SABBATH BREAKERS.

RESPECT for the Sabbath is to the young man a preservative against evil. God has thrust into the toil and fatigue of life a recreative day, when the soul is especially to be fed. It is no newfangled notion of a wild-brained reformer, but an institution established at the beginning. God has made natural and moral laws so harmonious that the body as well as the soul demands this institution. Our bodies are seven day clocks, that must be wound up as often as that, or they will run down. Failure must come sooner or later to the man who breaks the Sabbath. Inspiration has called it the Lord's Day, and he who devotes it to the world is guilty of robbery. God will not let the sin go unpunished, either in this world or the world to come.

This is the statement of a man who had broken this divine enactment: "I was engaged in manufacturing on the Lehigh River. On the Sabbath I used to rest, but never regarded God in it. One beautiful Sabbath when the noise was all hushed, and the day was all that loveliness could make it, I sat down on my piazza, and went to work inventing a new shuttle. I neither stopped to eat nor drink till the sun went down. By that time I had the invention completed. The next morning I exhibited it, and boasted of my day's work and was applauded. The shuttle was tried and worked well, but that Sabbath Day's work cost me thirty thousand dollars. We branched out and enlarged, and the curse of heaven was upon me from that day onward."

While the Divine frown must rest upon him who tramples upon this statute, God's special favor will be upon that young man who scrupulously observes it. This day properly observed, will throw a hallowed influence over all the week. The song and sermon and sanctuary will hold back from presumptuous sins. That young man who begins the duties of life with either secret or open disrespect of the holy day, I venture to prophesy, will meet with no permanent successes God's curse will fall upon his ship, his store, his office, his studio, his body and his soul. "The way of the wicked he turneth upside down." In one of the old fables it was said that a wonderful child was born in Bagdad, and a magician could hear his footsteps six thousand miles away. But I can hear in the footstep of that young man on his way to the house of worship this morning the step not only of a life-time of usefulness, but the on-coming step of eternal ages of happiness yet millions of years away.

THE MONEY GOD.

THERE are men who started out for financial success. They see how limber a man's back is when he bows down before some one transpicuous. They felt they would like to see how the world looked from the window of a three-thousand-dollar turnout. They thought they would like to have the morning sunlight tangled in the headgear of a dashing span. They wanted the bridges in the park to resound under the rataplan of their swift hoofs. They wanted a gilded baldrick, and so they started on the dollar hunt. They chased it up one street and chased it down another. They followed it when it burrowed in the cellar. They treed it in the roof. Wherever a dollar was expected to be they were. They chased it across the ocean. They chased it across the land. They stopped not for the night. Hearing that dollar even in the darkness thrilled them as an Adirondack sportsman is thrilled by a loon's laugh. They chased that dollar to the money vault. They chased it to the Government treasury. They routed it from under the counter. All the hounds were out—all the pointers and setters. They leaped the hedges for that dollar and they cried: "Hark, away! a dollar! a dollar!" and when at last they had came upon it and had actually captured it, their excitement was like that of a falconer who has successfully flung his first hawk. In the morning of their life, oh, how they devoured the prey!

There came a better time to their souls. They found out that an immortal nature cannot live on Government bonds. They took up a Northern Pacific bond, and there was a hole in it through which they could look into the uncertainty of all earthly treasures. They saw the wizen and paralytic bankers who had changed their souls into molten gold stamped with the image of the earth, earthy. They say some great souls by avarice turned into homunculi; and they said to themselves, "I will seek after higher treasures."

From that time they did not care whether they walked or rode if Christ walked with them; nor whether they lived in a mansion or a hut if they dwelt under the shadow of the Almighty; nor whether they were robed in French broadcloth or in homespun if they had the robe of the Saviour's righteousness; nor whether they were sandalled with morrocco or calf-skin if they were shod with the preparation of the Gospel. Now, you see peace on their countenance. Now, that man says: "What a fool I was to be enchanted with this world! Why, I have more satisfaction in five minutes in the service of God than I had in all the first years of my life, while I was gain-getting."

WASTED LIVES.

SO far back as 959 King Edgar of England made a law that the drink-cup should have pins fastened at a certain point in the side, so that the indulger might be reminded to stop before he got to the bottom. But there are no pins projecting from the sides of the modern wine-cup or beer-mug, and the first point at which millions stop is at the gravelly bottom of their own grave.

"You must stop drinking," says the doctor, "and quit the fast life you are leading, or it will destroy you." The patient suffers paroxysm after paroxysm, but under skilful medical treatment he begins to sit up, begins to walk about the room, begins to go to business. And lo! he goes back to the same grog-shops for his morning dram, and his evening dram, and the drams between. Flat down again. Same doctor. Same physical anguish. Same medical warning.

Now the illness is more protracted, the liver is more stubborn, the stomach more irritable, and the digestive organs are more rebellious. But after a while he is out again, goes back to the same dram shops, and goes the same round of sacrilege against his physical health.

He sees that his downward course is ruining his household, that his life is a perpetual perjury against his marriage vow, that that broken-hearted woman is so unlike the roseate young wife that he married, that her old schoolmates do not recognize her, that his sons are to be taunted for a lifetime by the father's drunkenness, that the daughters are to pass into life under the scarification of a disreputable ancestor. He is drinking up their happiness, their prospects for this life, and perhaps, for the life to come. Sometimes an appreciation of what he is doing comes upon him. His nervous system is all a-jangle. From crown of head to sole of foot he is one aching, rasping, crucifying, damning torture. Where is he? In hell on earth. Does it reform him?

After a while he has delirium, with a whole jungle of hissing reptiles let out on his pillow, and his screams horrify the neighbors as he dashes out of his bed, crying: "Take these things off me!" As he sits, pale and convalescent, the doctor says: "Now I want to have a plain talk with you, my dear fellow. The next attack of this kind you will have, you will be beyond all medical skill, and you will die." He gets better and goes forth into the same round again. This time medicine takes no effect. Consultation of physicians agree in saying there is no hope. Death ends the scene.

IF a man is right, all the bombardment of the world for five, ten, twenty, forty years will only strengthen him in his position. So that all you have to do is to keep yourself right. Never mind the world. Let it say what it will. It can do you no damage. Oh! when I see the influences abroad to destroy young men, I hardly know what to say. For the young men themselves all sympathy have I, and all compassion. For those who deal out the deadly stuff, all pity that they should bring upon themselves the condemnation of good society and the retributions of God. But for the liquor establishments themselves, the rum-selling restaurants, may God Almighty consume them with the brightness of his coming!

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

I PITY HER.

A WOMAN lately came to me and asked mewhat she should do about going to her own church. Said she, "It's so cold and the services are so cheerless. No life, no food in the sermons. Nor help in the prayer-meetings; it's just agony to go and sit there, longing for the farce to be over."

She felt she backslid every time she went. The place where she sought for rest gave her but an additional burden to carry, and her cry for help was like that of a starving woman for bread. I pity her.

Where lies the fault? I can hardly tell. A cold people, maybe, had made a cold preacher; tired and discouraged, the man of God had become formal and lost heart, and it's with pain that he thinks of two sermons that must be prepared and preached and a mid-week prayer service led. There is no joy over the thought of another opportunity to tell the "old, old story," such as there should be. And hence the breadless meetings, the juiceless services, the starvation gatherings such as this woman described.

What is the remedy? I answer—prayer, prayer, prayer, prayer and prayer—prayer, prayer. Followed by such Scripture as is found in John 15, Ezekiel 33 and 34, Deut. 28, and a getting out of ruts, out of formal ways of preaching and praying and talking about Jesus and his salvation. A turning things upside down—or rather—a turning of their right side up. The reverse is true now. A rest and change, too, might add to the good welfare of matters. Maybe the pastor is jaded, tired, over-worked; has been shut in too much with his books and himself and his own flock. Send him off to rest; to freshen up, to mingle with other men and other work and other workers. Give him a gun and a dog, and send him after duck instead of after men. Send him off fishing for trout; let him climb hills; get up where something else than the air of a church can get in his lungs. Let the songsters in the meadows and woods teach him how to give out the Gospel. Send him away off, where nobody will get after him to preach and let him hear sermons from Nature, and learn through the wild flowers and ferns to know God as an artist. This is the way to change dry meetings, and dry preachers into juicy, and fragrant, and fat markets, where the crowd will constantly resort, because there good things are to be found.

Make Them Laugh.

He will be a blessing to his day and generation who can make folks laugh. I have felt more than once I would give anybody five dollars, if he would set me going till my sides ached.

The Bible says, "A merry heart doeth good like medicine," and I am persuaded doctors bills would be less, if there were more joy which had to be expressed.

The trouble with the church, in many of its departments, is a notion that to make merry is to make for the devil, when the opposite is true. Some preachers would no more be guilty of creating a laugh in the meeting than of exploding dynamite. The result often is that many who might come to the house of God, if there was a little brightness thrown in, now remain away and seek other places where the joy of the evening helps to carry the load of the day. Give them laughter; plenty of it. Make it good.

Narrow, Broad Men.

Its queer how some broad-minded men can prove to be the narrowest of the narrow. Men who in ordinary life and work show breadth of thought and act, turn out in some matters so full of little ideas and notions, that you wonder if they are the same whom you knew as being great in their scope of plan and work.

I have been praying for some individuals that they might be used of God for "greater things," but I now confess my lack of faith, even God cannot make a peck out of a pint, when dealing with humanity. Where even he finds it possible to expand a man and make him grow, there you will find his power of development working. But currant bushes cannot grow like oaks, and I suppose there is no use for one to expect the supernatural to bring such to pass. I think, however, there are some folks who remain palm bushes, when God wants them to grow to be palm trees.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE FLAG LOWERED IN HAWAII.

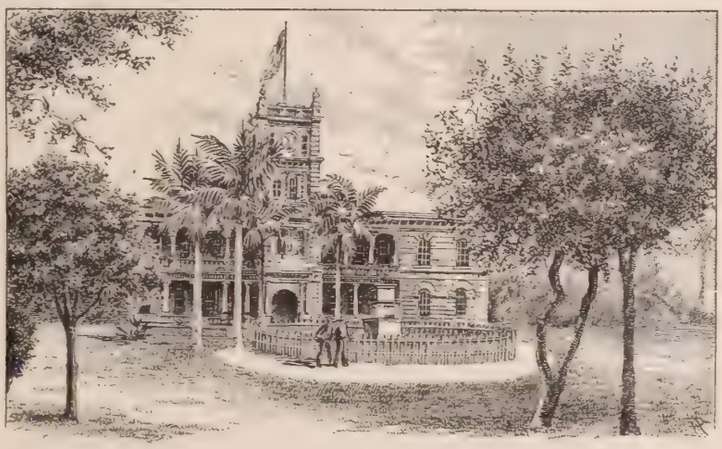
SOME surprise has been caused by the news that the United States flag which was raised over the Government House at Honolulu on Jan. 16, has been hauled down. It was done on April 1 by Mr. Blount, the Commissioner whom the President sent to the Hawaiian Islands to investigate the situation there. Mr. Blount also sent back to their ships the United States marines who had been on guard since the revolution. The first impression produced by the news was that the President and his Cabinet had abandoned the project of annexation. It appears, however, that the inference is not justified by the facts. If it is proved that the people of Hawaii really desire annexation, the conduct of Mr. Blount will be no hindrance to the project. From the reports which have come to hand, it appears that the revolution which overthrew the Queen's government, was the work of foreigners, domiciled in Hawaii, and not of the natives of the Islands. Our minister there was also active on the side of the insurgents and acted with some precipitancy in bringing in the United States forces and raising the Stars and Stripes. All that he was entitled to do, under his instructions and the law of nations, was to bring in a sufficient force to protect the lives and property of American residents. His conduct had the appearance of an eagerness to acquire possession of the Islands, which is common with monarchical governments, but is incompatible with the principles of republics. Mr. Blount's withdrawal of our troops and the lowering of the flag restores to the Hawaiian people their freedom of action. They can now decide without interference how they will be governed. If they wish annexation and give expression to their wish in a legitimate way, our Government can receive their application with dignity and without the suspicion of having acquired control of the Islands by force or intrigue. This is as it should be. It would be an onerous and disagreeable duty to govern an unwilling people. Those who would become a part of our nation should come to us voluntarily. This principle holds in religion as it does in national affairs and its recognition solves a problem which has puzzled many persons. The Kingdom of Heaven which Christ came to establish contains only those who desire to enter it. Those who are of his spirit, who invite him to rule over them and delight to do his will are welcomed, but he constrains no man to become his. (1. Chron. 28: 9.)

A Physician's Confession.

A PAPER found among the effects of a physician who died recently, contained a statement which solves a mystery twenty-eight years old. It appears that in 1865 a lady died in Clarksville, Tenn., after a long and mysterious illness. She was the wife of the Rev. A. M. Feltner, the rector of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Shortly after her death, her husband suddenly disappeared, and though diligent search was made for him, no trace of him was ever found. Two children were left behind at the rectory. They were adopted by the physician, who had attended Mrs. Feltner during her illness, and have been educated and brought up by him respectably and he has left them all his fortune. The secret of his interest in them as well as of the mysterious death of their father, has now come to light and causes profound astonishment. The physician states in his confession that when Mrs. Feltner died his professional interest was deeply stirred. He had carefully studied her case and given it unremitting attention. It had puzzled him, and after her death, he had an intense desire to learn the true nature of her malady. It preyed on him till it became irresistible. One dark stormy night, when few persons were likely to be abroad, he disguised himself and stole out to the cemetery where Mrs. Feltner was buried. He opened the grave and removed the body. Just as he was about to close the empty coffin he was struck by some one behind him. Turning around he stood face to face with Mr. Feltner. On the impulse of the moment the physician struck him with his spade, intending to stun him and make his escape. To his horror, however, he saw that his blow had crushed the temple bone and Mr. Feltner lay at his feet a corpse. Instinctively he adopted measures for self-preservation. He put his victim's body in the empty coffin and filled in the grave. Mrs. Feltner's body he took home, dissected it and made a discovery which has since proved valuable to science. He then buried the body in his cellar. In caring for the children of his victim and providing for them, the physician made all the reparation in his power, but no one would consider that he did his whole duty, as he evaded the punishment of his crime. We say, justice was not satisfied, the outraged law was not vindicated. Every one perceives the fact; yet how few people realize it when divine justice is concerned! Repentance and reformation are not sufficient in the case of the sinner against God, any more than in the physician's case, and the divine law would not have been vindicated without the punishment of the sinner, if Christ had not suffered in his stead. (Rom. 3: 25.)

An Application Withdrawn.

AN interesting letter was received last week by the Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in New York from an Englishman. It reminded the Clerk that the writer had, ten months ago, made an affidavit in his court declaring his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States and forswearing allegiance to the Queen of England. He now desired that his affidavit be cancelled, as, after mature deliberation, he had decided not to become a citizen but to remain a faithful subject of his Queen. His reason, as expressed in his letter, appears to be based on a religious analogy. He says he is a Christian and he believes that Christ is a King with laws in force on earth and, therefore, his people are "a royal people," and the subjects of a King. The clerk, of course, cancelled his affidavit, as requested. The Englishman has a perfect right to follow his own inclination in the matter, but one would have expected that the reasons he assigns would have led him to the opposite course of action. Christ being his King, he might logically have decided to abjure allegiance to any other monarch. The fact, however, appears to have led him, as it has many others, to the conclusion that the monarchical form of government is divine. That is his affair, but there is this satisfactory consideration about it, that if he is a faithful subject of Christ, he will be a law-abiding man and can live among us peacefully and usefully. He who renders to Christ the things that are his, will render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. (Matt. 22: 19-21.)



THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE, HONOLULU.

An Eventful Voyage.

A THRILLING story of peril at sea is told by the captain and crew of the Cresswell, which arrived at Philadelphia on April 12 from Hamburg. Two days after leaving Dartmouth, where she stayed to take on part of her cargo, she encountered a terrific storm and shipped a sea which carried away two of her boats and smashed the engine-room skylights. On the following day the gale increased to the proportions of a hurricane; and the tremendous seas that rolled over the ship and poured through the broken skylights almost put out the engine-fires. While the storm was at its worst, a dense mass of smoke began to ascend from the hold. The ship was on fire! "People on land," says the captain, "cannot easily realize our situation. A furious hurricane blowing, the steamer tossed to and fro like a toy boat in a whirlpool, huge cliffs of angry water uprearing themselves all around us, and a raging fire in the coal bunkers. While we were fighting the fire a furious blast from the southwest blew away our last remaining storm trysail. After eight hours' hard work the fire was put out, and then the exhausted crew tried to get some rest." But the storm still raged, and when it lulled, the steamer entered a region of fogs in which she twice narrowly escaped being run down. It is marvelous that the steamer could have run the gauntlet of so many perils and come safely into port. There are some souls who are nearing their eternal haven, who, looking back over the voyage of their lives, survey an analogous experience. Buffeted by the storms of trouble and combating the fierce fires of appetite and passion in their own hearts, it has seemed to them at times impossible that they could be saved, but the grace of God has been sufficient for them. (Eph. 6: 12, 13.)

A Fatal Delusion.

A FATALITY occurred at Jersey City, N. J., on April 5, as a result of an insane delusion. An aged man whose mind has become unbalanced, has had the idea for some time past that there was a broad flight of stone steps outside his bed-room window. His wife has always been careful, by securing the window, to prevent his putting his idea to a practical test. On that night, however, she forgot her usual precaution. She was shocked when she awakened just before dawn to see her husband in the act of stepping out of the window into space. She rushed to the window and tried to grasp his clothing, but was too late. He fell heavily to the pavement below and was taken up dead. None but a demented man would have had so insane a delusion, but there are many whose conduct indicates that they are as much deluded as to spiritual things as he was as to material things. When men step out from this life into the life beyond, they will find that neither large benefactions, observance of ordinances and ceremonies, church connections nor even irreproachable moral character afford a solid foothold. Only those who have committed themselves by faith to Christ's keeping will be saved from eternal catastrophe. (II. Timothy 1: 12.)

Holes in the Drinking Cups.

A NOVEL method has been adopted to prevent the loss of the drinking cups in the police stations in New York. Some time ago the Commissioners were constantly being called upon to replace the cups attached to the ice water fountains in the stations. The new supply soon disappeared and a fresh lot was needed. The experiment of chaining them was tried, but the links of the chains were opened and the cups taken. They were not valuable enough to be stolen, but persons who wanted water would take a cupful away and would not bring the cup back. The discovery that it was the water and not the cup that was the motive of removal, suggested a new idea for protecting the property. A hole was punched in the bottom of each cup, so that while any one could use it at the fountain, it was useless attempting to carry water away in it. The device has been successful, the last supply of the cups being still intact at each station. The problem thus solved has a strong resemblance to that which perplexes social economists. People will not be content with the good things of life which they can use, but insist on accumulating a provision for the future, even though, in order to do it, they appropriate the facilities which should be common property. Christ uttered an emphatic warning against this disposition as against all forms of selfishness. (Matt. 6: 34.)

BRIEF NOTES.

An extensive revival is in progress in Newton, Kans., under the leadership of Revs. R. L. Marsh and C. N. Severance. They began under the auspices of the Congregational church but other denominations cordially cooperate and since the building is unable to hold the crowds the meetings are held in the rink.

The Philadelphia Rescue Band desires to thank the readers of this journal for the prompt and liberal response to the appeal recently made in this column. Sufficient copies are now on hand for the work for some time to come and the Band will see that they are distributed where they are likely to do good.

Evangelist Leonard Weaver has been holding services in Rev. B. C. Needham's Church at Chester Valley, Pa. The Union of that town says that the crowds which have been gathered and the interest awakened has surpassed anything ever before witnessed in the neighborhood. At the close of the services Mr. Weaver went to Downingtown to commence work there.

Mr. Harry R. Newberry, Secretary of the U. S. Legation at Constantinople, has returned from Marsovan, whither he was sent by our minister to investigate the burning of the American College. He reports that the charge of the Turkish officials that the College was burned by the Armenians themselves was utterly false. The Armenians who have been imprisoned are innocent. Mr. Newberry believes, as was suspected, that the Government officials connived at the crime.

The American Tract Society held its sixty-eighth annual meeting in Washington, D. C., on April 8th. From the report at the meeting it appeared that the income of the Society for the past year had been $375,000. The Society supported 186 Colporteurs who, during the past year had made 146,000 visits to families and had put in circulation 121,452 volumes of religious literature. They found about 12,000 families without religious books and 7000 Protestant families without even a Bible. During the sixty-eight years of its existence the Society has circulated thirty million volumes in 150 languages, beside 415,000,000 tracts.

In a recent letter from a Russian Stundist to Pastor Landman of Scotland, South Dakota, the writer after describing the sufferings of his people from the famine, says: "Many people sent money to us from America and if this had not been the case, we do not know how it would have gone with us. Oh, how many tears has America dried during the past year! May the dear Lord reward them with rich blessing." Rev. P. Z. Easton, the eminent missionary to Persia, who is now in this country and to whom we are indebted for a translation of this letter, says that the Stundists have endured terrible sufferings but have remained true to their faith.

An ancient manuscript has been found in the Convent of Mount Sinai which promises to be of profound interest to Biblical scholars. Photographs of several of its pages have been taken and submitted to Prof. Harris of Cambridge and Prof. Nestle of Tubingen, and both gentlemen are of opinion that it is a Synac version of the four Gospels and probably the oldest in existence. Three eminent scholars have been sent by the University of Cambridge to examine the manuscript itself and make a copy.

A rising of the natives of Corea against the Christians is threatened. A report has reached the State Department in Washington that the lives of several American citizens are in danger. Secretary Gresham has arranged with the Navy Department to send a vessel from our squadron at Hong Kong to the scene of the disturbance. Both the Methodists and the Presbyterians have missionaries there, and, as our readers are aware, Dr. Hall is doing medical missionary work in the country. Prayers should be offered for their safety.

The first Bible in the language of the Gilbert Islanders was turned out a few days ago from the presses of the American Bible Society in the Bible House, New York. It was the result of the labors of Rev. Hiram Bingham who has devoted to it all his spare time for thirty-four years. Mr. Bingham is the son of a missionary and after graduating at Yale College went to the Gilbert Islands in 1856. He reduced the language to writing and in 1873 gave them the New Testament in their own language. Three years ago the manuscript of the Old Testament was finished and Mr. Bingham brought it to New York to be printed. The work has been done under his supervision and on April 11, the first completely printed and bound copy was issued.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

OBEDIENCE AND PROSPERITY.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, April 23, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D. Text: Joshua 1: 8, "This Book of the Law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success."

JOSHUA, the brave and noble son of Nun, greatly needed the divine counsel and encouragement which he here received. Nothing could be sadder to human view than the death of Moses at this critical time. The noble face which had caught and reflected the glory of the Lord, Israel should no more see; the voice which had so often talked to God and with the people, Israel should no more hear. The majestic man fell just when he was to reap the fruits of his wise counsels, his brave deeds and his loyal faith. His death was as if across the face of the sun at noonday there should come a cloud black as midnight. Heroes die; but, thank God, heroism lives. Moses is dead, but God lives, and his work shall still go forward. It is natural with us to sit with sad heart and clouded face beside a dead leader; but we must not mourn too long over even the wisest of leaders and the greatest of men. The voice of God comes to us at this juncture saying to us, "arise!" No matter who dies, those who live must move on in the line of duty. When great political leaders and our eloquent preachers die political parties and Christian churches must "arise." They must move forward with quickened step and heightened hope. In the most solemn hour of grief we ought to hear the voice of Providence summoning us to renewed effort, to greater exertion and to Assured Victory.

The sweetest of all consolation is found in carrying on the work which the fallen leaders undertook. No picture could be more heroic and sublime than that of the missionary's intended bride, personally known to many of you, arriving at the mission station three days after her beloved had fallen, and consecrating herself beside his new-made grave to the work to which he gave his life. The voice of Moses is silent in death, but the voice of Joshua rings out solemnly but cheerily, "Forward O Israel."

God always has the right man for the ripe hour. When the clock of his Providence strikes the solemn hour the hand of his Providence points to the needed man. This is evermore God's way. God's choice is always sovereign, but it is never arbitrary and reasonless. Neither David nor Cyrus, neither Paul nor Luther can come on the stage without God's guidance; and by God's grace all of them were gloriously fitted for their gigantic duties and their sublime achievements. God may now and then select men from the walks of luxury and from the circles of fashionable life, men who may be calm in danger and brave in battle. Sudden emergencies may develop unexpected abilities; but, as a general rule, God selects for burdens in manhood those who bore the yoke in youth. From the brick fields of Egypt Joshua came to the leadership of Israel and the conquest of Canaan. His pedigree was illustrious; his grandfather marched through the wilderness at the head of his tribe.

Joshua's Promotion

was not accidental. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim, trained as a soldier, he was prepared for the great occasion when it should arise. He was honored by accompanying Moses partly up Mount Sinai; and he was one of the two spies who came back with a good heart and an encouraging report. The years of silence during the weary wandering in the desert were years of training for the crucial moment when [illegible] years in training for three years of work. Joshua was always the soldier, prompt in obedience, decisive in command and daring in attitude. Wrapped up in his name is the name Jesus, the Captain of our Salvation. Moses found his task great; Joshua found his greater. Doubtless he fully appreciated the situation, and with no light heart did he enter on his terrific struggle. They who know most of war are the least anxious to invite its horrors. God appreciated Joshua's need and gave him great and precious promises. "As I was with Moses, so will I be with thee; I will not fail thee nor forsake thee." Any man with such a promise might achieve impossible things. Wonderful is this "as"; still more wonderful shall be this "so." Both as and so enwrap volumes commemorative of divine goodness and prophetic of human achievement.

The Book of the Law.

In studying this text and its context we have, in the first place, brought before us the value of a divine revelation. Our attention is directed at once to "this book of the law." It is affirmed that it should not depart out of the mouth of Joshua. The reference, doubtless, is to the law of Moses to which God attached the utmost importance. It is spoken of as if it were in Joshua's hand, as if it always must be in his mouth. Thus early is our attention directed to a book of a written law and a divine revelation. When Moses disappears and Joshua comes, the law of Moses is to be the rule for the conduct of Joshua. God does not create another Moses, but he promotes Joshua to the vacant place. Moses was honored by being called "the servant of the Lord." Joshua was prepared to hear the divine voice and to step into the vacant place. That voice had doubtless often been echoing in his own heart in his moments of communion with God. Now that he has entered upon his duty his attention is directed to his written orders. Dr. Joseph Parker reminds us that up to this time there has been no reference to writing as that reference is now made. Is it a wonderful thing that there should now be a book, an authoritative book, a divine book, a sacred scroll, silent yet voiceful? Joshua may thus know what God would have him do. Moses lived on the verbal utterances of Jehovah; but now there is the written Word for the guidance of Joshua and Israel. That Word is still ours, more fully written than in Joshua's day, and more carefully interpreted now than ever before. There is a sense in which the Church of Christ is the Church of the Book. The Book is to abide. It is

The Echo of God's Voice.

It bears the divine imprimatur. We must conform our lives to its divine teaching. When it is silent, we may not speak; when it speaks, we may not be silent. Those who strive to be wise above what is written, generally end by being foolish below what is written. Our rule to-day must be as in the past, "to the law and to the testimony." Jesus Christ loved this Book, believed it, taught it. He affirmed that he came not to destroy, but to fulfil the law. Our relations toward God and toward the world are determined in part by our treatment of God's law as made known in his Word. This Book in its present fullness is to be taken into our hearts and its teachings are to be manifested in our lives. The Bible is a library; in it are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. When the Word of God dwells in us richly we have wisdom for every emergency, knowledge for every time of need, and strength for every time of weakness. The Bible asks simply to be read, studied and tested; it is its own witness. Let us thank God for "this Book of the Law"; and let us see to it that it shall not depart from our mouths, but it shall fill them with wisdom, our hearts with truth and our lives with love.

We notice, in the second place, that the next thought in this text is the importance of daily meditation in divine truth. We have seen that the law was already embodied in a written document. We thus see that the book of Joshua gives its endorsement to the Pentateuch. A copy of the law was laid up in the sanctuary; but it was not enough that it should remain there in honor and reverence. God would have it in Joshua's mouth and heart. He was to make it the subject of careful study for personal wisdom and as the official standard for public life. Appointed to a high place in the nation, he was still to remember that he was under the authority of the divine law. This truth should impress itself deeply upon the heart of all Christian magistrates and other rulers in our day. The character of the good man as described in the first psalm suggests the duty here taught to Joshua; he is to meditate upon God's law day and night; and that law was finally to be written upon the tablets of his heart. The word translated "meditate" implies that kind of mental rumination which often expresses itself in audible words. Joshua was a man of affairs, a soldier, a ruler, a leader, and yet he did not plead his public duties as an excuse for neglecting the word of God. He had care enough for a score of men; but he made his daily business. Luther, when he was most pressed with his gigantic toils, said that he could not get along without three hours daily for meditation and prayer. When General Havelock was to march at six, he arose at four that he might have sufficient time to listen to God's voice in his word and to lift up his own voice to God in prayer. Correctly has it been said that no man is delayed on his journey when he stops for food and water. In the divine life we need daily supplies from God for daily duties among men. Israel could not live to-day on the manna of yesterday.

We know that Joshua had many direct communications from God. They came sometimes by outward appearances, as when the angel of the Lord's host met him at a critical moment; and they came sometimes by the Urim and Thummim. Still the written word was to be the subject of daily study. It has been said that these occasional revelations were meteoric flashes; they were lightning gleams in times of special darkness; but the light from the inspired word was the steady flame which ever shone on his path. There is wonderful power in constant and prayerful meditation on God's Word. Such meditation gives ripeness of judgment, pureness of heart, and oneness of high and holy motive. The world and the church to-day need men thoroughly imbued with God's thought. Thinkers are thought is the world's ruler. Divine thought rules the world divinely. A brilliant American essayist has said, "When God lets loose a great thinker everything is at stake." This thinker is greatest when he thinks as God thinks, and then it is that he will use his power to establish righteousness and to overthrow wickedness. Only as a man muses deeply in oration and sermon, in business or profession, will the fire brightly burn.

There never was such a book for meditation as the Bible. Small as was Joshua's part thereof it was more valuable than all the libraries of the world to-day. Think of the range of the Bible—its glowing prophecies, its sublime histories, its exalted poetry, its simple gospels, its instructive epistles and its majestic apocalyptic visions. The Bible is peerless amid the works of the ages; it is the unique book of the centuries. Here we have the purling brook and the noble river; here the sincere milk for babes, and the strong meat for men and women. Joshua was to study it by day and by night. Constant reading alone will enable us to perceive its matchless beauty, and its radiant glory; no formal perusal will fully reveal to us its hidden treasures. We must stand at the entrance to its long drawn corridors that we may hear the words of prophets and poets, of heroes and martyrs, of evangelists and apostles. We must tread these corridors that we may see the footprints, not of these alone, but also and mostly of the Son of God himself. O for men and women who, in our restless and bustling age, meditate day and night in the law of the Lord! Such men and women will be strong and do exploits.

Practical Obedience.

There was, in the next place, not only to be a revelation from God and meditation therein but there was also to be obedience to the truth received and declared. Joshua was not to let the truth depart out of his mouth. It was to govern him in all his instructions to the people and in all his relations to God. He was to know, to utter, and to obey the law of the Lord. That law was to fill his soul with meditation, his mouth with praise, and to mark his life by obedience. His speech was to be flavored with divine precepts, and his deeds were to be marked by divine truth. Calvin has well said, "Men never act skillfully except so far as they allow themselves to be ruled by the Word of God." God's Word is still the highest authority; it is still the revelation of God the Father, which was once delivered unto the saints. Ours is a faith that is delivered, delivered once for all, and delivered unto the saints. All meditation which is valuable takes form in practical obedience. Thus it comes to pass that Joshua was commanded to do according to what was written in the law. Religion is intensely practical. Christ went about doing good; so must Christians. They are not to spend their lives in dreamy meditation or in vapid utterance. They must bring things to pass; they must secure practical results. It is useless for us to advertise the quantity of water that is in our well while men and women about us are dying of thirst. The value of our well is seen in the number of thirsty souls to which it gives life and hope. Only as we obey God do we show that we love God; only as we do his will is it possible for us really to know his will. Thoughts and words must be translated into deeds. But such obedience does not come except as the result of definite purpose and effort; and so we are taught that Joshua was

To "Observe to Do."

No man makes progress in Christian life except he determines so to do and then uses the means adapted to such progress. No man will become eminently pious unless he determines so to become. Every man who grows in grace must heed the admonitions of conscience, the guidance of Providence, and the teachings of the Bible. No man can see the path in which God would have him walk if his eyes are covered by the scales of ignorance or prejudice.

Neither may we allow ourselves to pick and choose amid God's commands; we see that Joshua was to do according "to all that is written" in the law. The only question with him was, what is written in the law? It was not his purpose to keep the parts of the law which were in harmony with his tastes and feeling, and to violate those which were not. Joshua was determined to turn neither to the right hand nor to the left. He was commanded to be strong and courageous and to keep the path divinely marked out for his feet. Never did Mary, the mother of Jesus, speak more wisely that when she said to the servants at the marriage in Cana of Galilee, "Whatsoever he saith unto you do it." Never did a man more thoroughly need courage than did Joshua; but he dared to do right and in every critical hour God was by his side to inspire his heart, to strengthen his arm and to reward his toil with assured success.

This reference brings us to the last thought in this text—the promise of prosperity. The word translated "prosperous" has in it the suggestion of wisdom of conduct, of action in the spirit of wisdom considering the times and regarding all the circumstances. It is a broad and suggestive word. The man who lives in and for God is the man possessed of practical skill and truest wisdom. He may not be marked by brilliancy of genius, but he will have what is far better, the tact and skill which bring success.

Success Comes to Such Men in harmony with natural law; it comes also as the result of the immediate promise of God. The man who fears God so much that he knows no other fear is the man who must finally win in the race of life; the man who loves truth so much that he hates all falsehood will have all the forces of the Eternal on his side. The very stars in their courses will fight against his foes and in his favor. The man who has God on his side can really have no one against him. The man who seeks the guidance of omniscience shall have the assistance of omnipotence. Cromwell's Ironsides were irresistible in battle. Going into the conflict chanting the psalms and trusting in God they scattered their foes like chaff before the whirlwind.

A greater than Joshua is placed before us as the model of life and the inspiration to duty. Jesus Christ promised his disciples as they went out on their great mission that he would be with them even unto the end of the world. Each one of us may claim the precious promise which God made to Joshua, "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee; I will not fail thee nor forsake thee." Was ever so sublime a promise given before to the children of men? Any man can stand when the Rock of Ages is behind him. The man who sees the Invisible can do the impossible. Well might Joshua go forward without fear and with high hope assured that "there shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." Brave and noble Joshua, faithful in that which was least God made him ruler over the hosts of Israel, gave him an honored place on the inspired page, and made him the type of his own Son, the greater Joshua, the blessed Jesus. May the God of Moses and the God of Joshua be our God now and evermore!

The Great Apostacy.

The Culmination of Sceptical and Vicious Movements in Satanic Incarnation

BY JAMES STEPHENS, M.A.

WE may learn some important facts relative to the development and manifestation of Antichrist from a careful study of the second chapter of the second epistle to the Thessalonians. In writing to this church, the apostle aims to reassure them. They had received some false teaching. The early churches were often assailed by this enemy, the false teacher. There were those at Corinth who said the resurrection was past, and others at Thessalonica who said the day of the Lord had then come. Paul exhorts the believers not to be taken by this snare, for when the day of the Lord shall have come the Lord Jesus Christ shall himself have come, and his people shall have been gathered to him. Therefore be not troubled by teaching to the effect that the day of the Lord is present.

The great argument used is this—before the day of the Lord comes there will be the apostacy and the revelation of the man of sin. A great movement and a notable man. In Ps. 2, we read, "The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us." The people will join in this utterance of kings and rulers. Then will be the apostacy, the departure from, the denial of, the Father and the Son.

The movement develops a man who heads it, the man of lawlessness, the man who sets himself forth as God, and takes his place in God's own sanctuary as God—the temple to be rebuilt at Jerusalem. He will claim to be the Deity. He will claim worship as well as homage. Before the day of the Lord comes one claiming in power the attributes of Deity will be revealed.

The time of the revelation is then given. The apostle says the movement was at work even in his day. "The mystery of iniquity doth already work;" but something and some person is restraining, and the man of sin cannot be revealed till this person and this thing that restrains be taken out of the way. I can hardly help thinking the mystery of iniquity is balanced by the mystery of godliness, and he who is maintaining and developing the mystery of godliness is the personal Holy Spirit in the Church. When these restrainers are taken out of the way, then the lawless one shall be revealed.

Thirdly, we have the character of this man of evil. He shall be remarkable above every man who has ever appeared. He shall be in the energy of Satan. Satan has dwelt in many with marvelous effect and still wickedness has its prodigies. But he shall be one in whom Satan's energies shall be manifest in powers, and signs and wonders of a lie. These are the three names applied to the works of the Lord Jesus Christ—power, signs, and wonders. This great man will come as Satan's parody of Christ, and receive power which will manifest itself wondrously like that of Christ. He will actually work miracles, not merely pretended miracles, but real ones, by the power of the devil. And he will have all power of deceiving.

The apostle says, "The mystery of iniquity doth already work." It will continue to work until it culminates in this marvelous being. He is not revealed yet; hence the mystery of iniquity must be working now in the world. What light does this throw on the progress of the age so greatly boasted of? "We are passing on to the golden age; is the world getting better and better?" So we hear on every side. But instead of this we know the mystery of iniquity is at work preparing for the tremendous culmination of sin in Antichrist. Satan is to have an hour of special greatness; but the hour of his greatest power on earth closely precedes the manifestation of the Son of God. Then Jesus shall bind the strong man. When Jesus comes Antichrist and all his power shall be overcome, "destroyed by the breath of his mouth." And Satan shall be cast bound into a pit for a thousand years.

The preparation for the success of the Antichrist, the preparation on the part of men to receive him, is found in the simple fact that they receive not the love of the truth. In this simple thing is the germ of preparedness for receiving Satan's travesty of Christ. Those who receive not the truth are ready to receive strong delusion, to believe a lie. So Jesus told the Jews that refusing to receive him who came in the Father's name they would receive one who came in his own name. In view of these things the apostle exhorts the Thessalonian Christians to "hold fast the traditions taught by word or writing." Paul spoke in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, and we must hold fast these words, knowing that God will justify whatever he has said in his own time.

THE LINE ON A LEAF.

IT was last moving day, and the garret and loft
Had been emptied of books that were broken and torn;
And the mild spring breezes, so scented and soft
Now played with old manuscripts, yello and worn.
As the last dray had rolled from the sidewalk away,
The heavy-framed mirror was lifted with care
From the mantel, where, faithfully, many a day,
It had pictured the faces of loved ones so fair.

As adown through the yard I have wandered alone,
While the new tenants entered with laughter and shout;
A few vagrant leaves by the breezes were blown
From the books that were torn and lay scattered about;
And a tiny old shoe, with a hole in the toe,
Lay near by the path where I sauntered along.
I reached down and took it, it tempted me so,
Not heeding the sneers of the mirth-making throng.

Near the shore lay a leaf that was new, edged with gold,
Bearing tear-wrinkled spots 'mid the writing so pale—
For a heart-broken mother, a-tremble there told
That "To-day baby died," in a pen-uttered wail.
Still not heeding the scoffs of the festive and gay,
I was kissing the page and caressing the shoe;
And with better resolve I betook me away
To that mother, my wife, my companion so true.

When the moving was done, and the fire was aglow
In the grate, as we counted the children anew,
There were eight in the parlor with parents below,
While above in the mansions of God there were two.
As a sigh then attracted the gaze of them all
To the sad face of mamma, so loving and true,
They could see the great tears on the gentle hands fall,
As they tenderly lay on the leaf and the shoe.

Questions & Answers

OUR MAIL-BAG.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in frequent receipt of letters from very needy persons in different parts of the country, some of the cases being pitiful in the extreme. These applications are so numerous as to be altogether beyond our capacity for extending relief. Among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there are doubtless many benevolent people who would be pleased to be put in communication with some of these deserving poor ones. If any of our readers so charitably disposed, would send us their names and addresses for this special purpose, we will send to each one letter a year and no more, from some needy person who has appealed for help. All letters relating to business of this nature should be addressed to "The Relief Box," CHRISTIAN HERALD office.

H. W. Moore, Philadelphia, Pa. What do the words Talitha Cumi, on page 217 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mean?

The words are Arabic, and the translation is given in Mark 5: 41.

"Subscriber, Mountain State." Had Jesus any brothers or sisters, and was Mary, the mother of Christ, twice married?

If our correspondent will examine Matthew 13: 55, and Mark 6: 3, he will find therein well established the fact that our Lord had four brothers. There is no evidence whatever to support the suggestion in the latter part of the question.

Geo. H. Clark, Savannah Sound, Bahamas, W. I. There is a notion prevailing among some people that the prayer which Christ taught his disciples is wrongly called the Lord's Prayer, and should be called the Disciples' Prayer.

As it has now been known and loved and spoken for 18 centuries as "The Lord's Prayer," we do not apprehend that any suggestion looking to a change in the nomenclature will now be heeded by the Christian world. Besides, it is properly called "The Lord's Prayer," having originated with the Saviour, who taught it to his disciples.

L. Peterson, Sioux City, Ia. How did the ceremony of kissing the Pope's toe originate?

It is probably the highest modern form of the kiss ceremonial, and is a relic of heathen times. The Druids, 1,000 years before Christ, kissed the toe of their high priest. The ancients kissed the toe of the statue of Jupiter, just as the Romanists to-day kiss the toe of the pontifical "descendant of Peter," the only difference being that the Pope wears a slipper with a silver cross embroidered on the toe, at the point where the lips rest and the heathen image of Jupiter had no foot-gear whatever.

E. G. Kirkpatrick, Waterloo, Neb. How many times did the Israelites go into idolatry?

It would be difficult to answer with absolute accuracy. The first allusion to their idolatry is found in Gen. 31: 19, when Rachel stole her father's seraphim. Afterward, we find that the Israelites gave evidence of idolatrous practices on the way from Shechem to Bethel, they defiled themselves with idols in Egypt; later, they worshipped the golden calf, images and stars (Exod. 32: 26), Moloch, Remphan, Chiun, and Baal-Peor, Baal, Baal-berith, Ashtoreth, Chemosh, Milcom, the sun, the moon, were all worshipped in succession. Even after possessing Palestine, they went astray after the idols of the land times without number.

B. L. Boomer, Campello, Mass., writes:

My wife is an invalid and she spends many pleasant hours with her cabinet of shells, quite as much int rested in a new specimen as you would be in a new brick from Nineveh with an unknown inscription. And so she has diligently searched for the identity of the "Onycha" of Dr. Talmage's text from DeBlainville, all the way down through her several catalogues in vain. Referring again to the Bible (which you sent us) we found in Article 39, page 103, Aquatic animals, "Strombus," which I think will admit of, perhaps, this interpretation. Very little odor would arise from the burning of any marine shell, unless it might be the Epidemus, which in some cases is quite thick. If "Onycha" and "Onyx" are identical, then, I think, we have a hint, which followed, makes it very probable that "Onycha" instead of being the shell, was simply the foot or "Operculum" of the shell, which in some species (the Strombus in particular) is very large and precisely like horn, and when burned would of course emit a strong odor. The operculum of most shells (called "eye-stones") is calcareous and would be odorless."

HEALING AND TEACHING IN CHINA

Realizing this condition of the science of healing as practised in China it is easy to conceive how great a boon must be the existence of such hospitals as that in Canton. During Dr. Kerr's superintendence of it, he has performed with his own hand more than thirty-five thousand operations, besides giving nearly a million medical attendances.

Similar happy results have come from the work of Dr. Niles, in Canton. Women were the most common victims of surgical ignorance and incapacity. They would have benefited little from Dr. Kerr's skill, as the average Chinaman would generally prefer that his wife should die than that she should be treated by the male foreign physician. But the lady physician excites no prejudice. Dr. Niles has been called in by the highest officials of the city to attend the female members of their households, and has saved thousands of lives, which, but for her skill, would have been sacrificed. Another feature of her work has been her care of blind girls, who are in China sold by their parents to women who keep them for infamous purposes. Dr. Niles has succeeded in restoring the sight in some cases, and in others has rescued the girls from their miserable fate. Recently, some benevolent Chinamen, who learned what she was doing, subscribed more than a thousand dollars to build a home near the hospital, in which a number of these blind girls could be sheltered under her care.

One peculiarly sad feature of the inhumanity which grows out of the powerlessness to relieve suffering has become a burden on the hearts of both these Christian physicians. Dr. Kerr is making it his principal business during his visit home to meet this difficulty. With the same ignorance that exists in respect to other maladies the Chinese physician is helpless in the presence of insanity. The afflicted creatures are thus left to the care of their families and often suffer horrible barbarities. Many of them might be restored to mental health in such asylums as abound in this country, but of which there is not a single counterpart in all China. Dr. Kerr describes in pathetic language the poor creatures chained up in the Chinese houses, a misery to themselves and a terror to those who are around them. He is endeavoring to enlist the sympathy of Christian people in America in their condition and to raise a fund for the erection of an asylum.

A noteworthy feature of the grand work which has been carried on in the Canton hospital for the past half century,is the small cost it entails on the missionary societies, whose work it has so materially helped. The site of the hospital, which measures six hundred by eighty-two feet, was purchased for its present use by funds raised in China, chiefly by European and American merchants who perceived its need and the advantages to be derived from the institution. The same benevolent persons also raised the funds for the erection of the hospital, which comprises six large buildings used for the accommodation of patients, an operating-room, and a residence for the physicians in charge,to which has been added a seventh building devoted to the medical college. The cost of the hospital is also defrayed in China by the fees of the patients, supplemented by the public contributions, of which a large part comes from Chinese officials who know and value the work of the institution. The only expense connected with the hospital that falls on the Presbyterian Board,is the salaries of the medical staff.

The self-denying labors of the doctors and nurses are a mystery to the affiicted people whom they serve. The popular theory is that they are intent on "accumulating merit" in the future world, but even that theory does not sufficiently explain their motive to the Chinese mind. It is when he is trying to understand it that the opportunity for direct Christian teaching is afforded, and the missionary can tell him of the love of Christ, "which constraineth" and point him to the Great Physician. That such a practical lesson has not been without its effect is evident from the facts. It cannot be merely a coincidence that the real progress of missionary work in China dates from the year of the commencement of medical mission work. Dr. Morrison went to China in 1807, and twenty-six years later Dr Williams wrote home that he had just seen the first and only convert. Not much greater progress had been made in another five years, and when Dr. Kerr went to Canton in 1852, he saw the first convert in that city. Now there are thirteen native churches in and around Canton, with over eight hundred members, and there are fifty thousand Christians in all China. How much of this progress is due by God's blessing to the medical work, eternity alone can determine.

TRUE WISDOM.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing May 7. Prov. 3: 13-18; James 1: 5-6.

WISDOM is a rarer quality than we generally realize. It is not learning, although learning is an aid to it. A man may be deeply read and have an intimate acquaintance with the literature of his own and other lands, and yet be destitute of wisdom. The word, as it is defined, signifies discernment, prudence, judgment and discretion. These qualities are largely natural endowments, which, however, require development. That man must have been a very superficial observer of human nature who believes that all men are born equal. God sends some men into the world richly gifted with powers which may be used to bless and enrich humanity. The poet, the painter, the orator, the philosopher, the inventor bring their powers with them, and the world welcomes them as gifts from a Power higher than itself. So with wisdom; it is the gift of God.

But for our own encouragement we are taught that this gift may be attained. The ordinary endowment may be enlarged and developed. If any man discovers that he lacks it—and how many make that discovery!—the Source of wisdom is accessible to him. "Let him ask of God," is the apostle's advice and he adds the assurance, "It shall be given to him." There is no doubt, or qualification, or hesitancy in the promise. The direction is practical, simple and logical,and the result is assured. It is surprising that we do not more frequently or more earnestly act upon it. The chief reason is that we do not practically believe it and do not put the promise to the test. Thus we come to the conclusion that the praying man is the wise man and the wise man is the praying man. The world does not believe the fact,but that is because the world does not recognize true wisdom when it sees it. The wise men have often been called fools,because they will not reverence the world's idols nor seek its prizes. The wise man, in the world's opinion, is he who can accumulate a fortune and can gain power and popularity. If he can make the best of both worlds so much the wiser he, but it will never admit that a man can be wise who sacrifices this world to the next. So it comes about that the wise man must be content to dispense with the world's homage. But "wisdom will be justified of her children." They may have to wait for their vindication, but it will surely come.

B. Y. P. U. NOTES.

One of the most gratifying results of the organization of all the Young People's Societies is the impetus they have given to the collections for Foreign Missions. The B. Y. P. U. of Greenwood Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.,is one of many which have done excellent service in this line. It recently sent fifty dollars to Burmah to support a native teacher in one of the Brec villages, where the Gospel has never yet been preached. Fifty dollars was sent also to the Baptist mission on the Congo and twenty-five dollars to Dr. J. S. Grant to endow a free bed for a year in his hospital at Ningpo. A box is being prepared to be sent out this summer to the hospital. It will contain lint, bandages and if possible a case of surgical instruments for Dr. Grant's use.——The Union of Delevan, Wis., has given its attention to another and very interesting field. During the past year it has kept the churches and missions of Chicago supplied with fresh flowers for distribution in the hospitals and homes of the poor. No less than 1,500 bouquets were thus sent and were very gratefully received. —— At Brockton, Mass., the Union devotes its monthly Conquest Meeting to the consideration of the best means of winning the Europeans in America for Christ. As this is a very important and also very difficult sphere of labor there is much room for suggestion and active effort.——The district of Tulare,Cal.,comprises seven unions, all of which are prosperous and enthusiastic in their work. They have devoted their missionary efforts mainly to the support of the chapel railroad car, which is reaching isolated settlements and is doing valuable work.

MICHIGAN'S NEW B. Y. P. U. PRESIDENT.

The honor of being President of the banner State organization of the Baptist Young People's Union has just been conferred on Mr. Walter H. Carman of Ann Arbor, and under his leadership it attained the highest position on the roll of States. It was, however,impossible for him any longer to fulfil the duties of the office and the Union was called upon to elect his successor. There was no difficulty in that duty. Mr. Merritt had conclusively proved his fitness for the important office and he was elected. He has been President of the B. Y. P. U. of the North Baptist Church of Detroit and is President of the Associational Union. Mr. Merritt is a graduate of Kalamazoo College. He was for some time principal of the Grass Lake High School,but of late has been connected with the Detroit Journal. Church work, especially the kind that would bring him in contact with children and young people has always appealed strongly to his heart,and he has cheerfully accepted offices involving the sacrifice of much valuable time and labor. He is a Director of the Young Men's Christian Association of Detroit, one of the examiners of his Alma Mater, and was chairman of the Press Committee at the great national B. Y. P. U. convention. There is every reason to expect that the high efficiency, for which the Michigan Union has become famous, will be maintained and perhaps increased under Mr. Merritt's leadership.

A POLICEMAN'S C. E. SOCIETY.

THE EMBLEM.

A CHRISTIAN Endeavor unlike any other in the world has been organized in New York. Its active membership is restricted to the friends who organized the Society and policemen and ex-policemen. Its meetings are held every Wednesday afternoon at 3:30 in the rooms of the Christian Police Association at 235 W. 30th Street. The emblem of the Society is a combination of helmet, club and shackles which ex-roundsman Mead who is President of the Society interprets, "We club together as a Christian Endeavor to free the policemen of New York City from the shackles of sin." The popular idea of the policemen of the city would not encourage much hope in organizing a C.E. Society among them, but the fact proves that there are on the force many earnest Christian men, who have held fast their faith and consistency of life in spite of the fiercest temptation. The special effort for the New York policemen,which developed into the Christian Police Association, originated in the visit of Miss Gurney, an English lady, who has made this her life work. She commenced it in London, and has since organized Associations in Australia, Africa, India, Sweden, and Canada, besides those in English provincial towns. During her visit to the United States in 1891, she succeeded in organizing Associations in Chicago, Buffalo, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and New York, and they are now spreading to other cities. At first the meetings in New York were held in the rooms of the American Sunday School Union, but as larger accommodations became necessary, the Thirtieth Street rooms were acquired and now there are regular meetings there every Sunday afternoon. Good singing, Scriptural exposition, testimonies, and general conversation on the needs of the men occupy the time, and if any of the members of the force are sick, the fact is reported to some Christian man who is deputed to visit them. On Friday afternoons there is a meeting for the children of policemen which is well attended. A Christian Endeavor Society is an appropriate adjunct to the general work, and the welcome it has received from the men and the enthusiasm with which they have entered into it are encouraging features of the movement.

When the Epworth League selected that date for its conference, the Committee was not aware that the Montreal conference would be held then; but as soon as the fact was discovered, efforts were at once made to prevent the seeming discourtesy of holding a rival conference at the same time. Considerable inconvenience was involved in making the change, but, as the Christian Endeavor Society was the senior society, and had the claim of priority of selection, the concession has been made.

HOME

THE prince rides up the palace gates,
And his eyes with tears are dim;
For he thinks of the beggar maiden sweet
Who may never wed with him.
For home is where the heart is,
In dwelling great or small,
And there's many a splendid palace
That's never a home at all.

The yeoman comes to his little cot
With a song when day is done;
For his wife is standing at the door,
And his children to meet him run.
For home is where the heart is,
In dwelling great or small.
And there's many a stately mansion
That's never a home at all.

Bright Hawaiian Girls.

Under Christian Training, they are Becoming Excellent Housewives—A Glimpse of a Hawaiian Cooking School at Honolulu.

FROM a friend and reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Honolulu, Mr. A. F. Cooke, we have received a most interesting letter, forwarding facts concerning the progress of the Christian educational movement in that country. On this page we give one of a number of photographs sent by Mr. Cooke, being a view of the Cooking Department of the Kawaiahao Seminary, in Honolulu, an institution established by Christian missionaries twenty years ago for the education of young girls, and which probably more than any other similar institution in that country, has exercised a marked moral influence on the present generation of Hawaiian women. There are now in the Kawaiahao Seminary, over 130 girls, under the tuition and direction of Miss Ida M. Pope, Principal, and these young natives of the mid-Pacific kingdom, are as diligent and proficient as girls of their age anywhere. It is really a wonderful transformation that has brought these children, whose grand-parents were painted savages and cannibals, to the enjoyment of bright, happy Christian lives, amid the surroundings of civilization.

There are not a few really fine singers and musicians among the Kawaiahao girls, but amid a variety of different accomplishments, the useful, home-keeping arts are not overlooked. In that "land of lotus eaters," it was formerly a trait of the people that they took things pretty much as they came; but education and the admixture of foreigners has created a new, energetic and enterprising tone, which extends to every phase of life, and is specially felt in the social improvement of the people. However dejectedly one may talk of the Hawaiians and their faults, a visit to the boarding-schools will result in imparting confidence as to the future. There are three for boys and three for girls on the islands, besides good government day-schools and a government industrial school. The mechanical training for boys is careful and thorough, and the girls are equally well taught in various branches, one of the most important being the cuisine.

A Hawaaian menu is varied and by no means unattractive, although it usually contains several dishes to which the foreigner has to accustom himself slowly. A recent description of a dinner at Honolulu says: "The table was thickly covered with ferns and vines, on which rested numerous calabashes, some filled with poi and others with another kind of pasty-looking substance, which consisted of cocoanut and sweet potato mixed. Crabs, boiled sweet potatoes, baked taro and bread fruit, raw fish, live shrimps, the snake-like squids, moderate-sized bundles tied with ti leaves, and small piles of ground kukui nuts and chopped onions. A roasted pig graced one end of the table, and mangoes, tamarinds, bananas, oranges, and ohelos were spread along the counter. Everybody started right in and ate with the greatest relish. There were plates for all, but not a knife or fork to be seen. Fingers were dipped in the poi, a dexterous twist was given to the wrist, and the lump that adhered was carried to the mouth and sucked off with evident enjoyment. The mysterious-looking bundles were untied and full justice was done the delicious and steaming contents of mullet or chicken, which had been cooked underground, in ti leaves, and thus had all the juices and flavors preserved. It was somewhat trying to the strangers at times to have a lively shrimp crawl in their direction and to see him snapped up by someone and eaten with relish. The squid was a trifle unappetizing, too, and they found eating out of the same calabash with their neighbors a little unusual, but the crabs and chicken, and fish were all that could be desired, and, unless too fastidious, one need not be hungry at the end of the luau."

There is a faint suggestion of a Chinese diet in squid-eating, yet the Hawaaians appear to like it. Food is, after all, very largely a matter of climate and availability, and doubtless much that appears on an American table would be quite as surprising to a Hawaiian as the squids and poi of those islanders are to ourselves.

Taught by a Boy.

A LAD in Boston, rather small for his years, works in an office as an errand boy for four gentlemen who do business there. One day the gentlemen were chaffing him a little about being so small, and said to him: "You never will amount to much, you never can do much business; you are too small."

The little fellow looked at them. "Well," said he, "small as I am, I can do something which none of you four men can do." "Ah, what is that?" they asked. "I don't know as I ought to tell you," he replied. But they were anxious to know, and urged him to tell what he could do that none of them were able to do. "I can keep from swearing!" said the little fellow. There were some blushes on four manly faces, and there seemed to be very little anxiety for further information on the point.

Good Temper in the House.

"THERE is a grace needed for the pantry," writes Dr. Talmage. "Somehow cups, and glasses, and cake-baskets will get broken, and no one has done it. Knives will disappear, and no one has taken them. An old saucer that was given to your grandmother the day of her marriage is cracked and set back on the shelf as though it had been uninjured. The teacaddy has been despoiled, or flour has unreasonably failed, with no miracle, as in Zarepta, to replenish it. There are but few women who can keep their temper when their best china set gets broken. To study economy a month, and to find the result of this unusual carefulness has leaked out at some mysterious spigot; to have a whole mess of milk soured by one thunderstorm; to have the washboiler boil over and put out the fire; to have the dessert only half done when the people at dinner are waiting, wondering whether it is to be sago pudding or narcisse blancmange; to have the servant make up her mind she don't like the place, and leave the house in the midst of the ironing; to have to provide elaborate entertainment for some one whom you asked to come to your house without any idea that she would accept the invitation; to find after the quinces are all peeled and cut that the brass kettle has been borrowed; all this demands grace for the kitchen."

A Child's Memory of its Mother.

"SUPPOSE," writes Virginna B. Harrison, in Motherhood, "that a woman, having the ability to do so, were asked to paint her own portrait, and write a complete description of herself, of her mental gifts, characteristics, manners, and ways, that in after years, her children might, from them, form an estimate of their mother. Is there anyone of us all, who would not endeavor to have her pictured face, sweet, calm and thoughtful? Who would not make the most of every beauty and soften each defect? Would she not write of her gentleness, truthfulness, and amiability, enlarging, as far as conscience would allow, upon her virtues, and glossing over her faults? Would she omit the narration of scenes, in which she had forgotten her dignity under the stress of temper, had been unjust or indifferent? The autobiography would only be a record of tenderness, good deeds, sweet thoughts and noble aspirations.

"Now have you ever thought, that in the memories and hearts of our children, we are, day by day, painting our portraits, writing our memoirs? Every mother who indulges in out-bursts of temper, in which her face is transformed with anger, may with sorrow and mortification, feel that she has placed these scenes on record, in the mind of her child, and surely such a realization, would lead her to soften and beautify her harsh words and actions."

Be Kind to the Animals.

He loveth most who loveth best
All things, both great and small.

wrote the poet, and it is certainly one of the signs of a heart right with God that it loves all things, animate or inanimate, that were created by his hand. Mozart was very fond of animals. In the early days of his housekeeping with his young wife, he says: "Sometimes I spent more money than I ought upon some pet, for I was very fond of animals. Once I bought a starling that whistled one of my airs. I was much attached to the dear little fellow, and when he died I erected a monument over his grave in the garden." Von Weber did not consider his establishment complete without pets. When he lived in Dresden, he and his wife took one summer a nice country-house which they called "Little Paradise." Wagner, who at the time of his death was the king of the modern music world, kept many pets about him, and sorrowed greatly when any of them died.

RELIGION IN THE HOME.

A LADY writes us from Los Angeles, Cal., as follows: "I have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for twelve years. I was present when Dr. Talmage preached his first sermon in Brooklyn and have heard him in his own church since, many times. This morning, in opening our CHRISTIAN HERALD, my eye fell first upon his sermon 'Religion at Home.' It affected me as it is a subject very dear to my heart and has taken form in a Society which, in name, will be new to you, though not in substance. Our first meeting of officers was held this week. They are comprised of pastors of our leading churches (different denominations, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, English Lutheran, Christian Congregational, Methodist South), and some prominent missionary workers—and I felt after reading Dr. Talmage's sermon I must send him our Constitution and Rules, as it was so in sympathy with his expressed views. We have become so progressive, and we delegate so much of our children's religious training to outside influences such as Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, Y. M. C. A., etc., and their literary drill to the school that, as you say, the family altar in this country is acknowledged by these very officers, as sadly neglected among their parishioners. How can we have the 'fruits' Christ expects to find in the home, when they that love the Lord fail to speak often one to the other in the home circle? God bless you in your work. My sainted father was a pastor in New York." EMILY J. VALENTINE.

Accompanying the letter is a copy of the Constitution and Rules of "The Home Christian Society; an interdenominational society for the promotion of Christian growth at home." This is we believe the pioneer organization. Its officers are Rev. Burt Estes Howard, President; Rev. John W. Campbell, D.D., Mrs. Lucy S. Blanchard, Rev. Daniel Read, LL.D., and Rev. E. J. Scudder, (Santa Barbara), Vice Presidents. Our correspondent is one of the directors of the new society. In a pleasant prefatory note, she explains that she has been assured by "an extensive acquaintance with the home life in many Christian families, that the members thereof frequently live for years under the same roof without that intimate fellowship and 'communion of saints,' that they outwardly profess, also finding with all the helpful societies on record there are none especially devoted to the home, it has been my prayerful desire to aid in changing into harmony, much of the discouragement and discord that our blessed Saviour never intended should mar the Christian development of his children (of larger or smaller growth) in their home life." We hope soon to hear that the Home Christian Society has multiplied exceedingly.

In the Country in Japan.

IN a very interesting letter from Japan, Kate Elizabeth Clark gives us this pretty picture of juvenile rural life in the land of the Yellow Dragon:

"Over every pool and runnel dart the steel-blue and black dragon-flies, like tiny spears, much hunted by country boys and girls; which reminds one of that brief, pathetic Japanese poem, written as an epitaph upon her little lad of seven by the most famous poetess of Japan:

Tombo-tsuri!
Ky o wa do-ko made
Itta, yara!

which may be translated:

My chaser of the dragon fly!
My son! my son!
How far, I wonder, have those little feet,
This sad day, run?

"Japanese children are early taught to restrain those impulses to cruelty which seem to be characteristic of certain children in every nation—a survival of primitive barbarian instincts. They are not allowed to believe that an insect or a fish has no feeling, and that its little life is of no consequence, and they are constantly warned that every act of cruelty will be punished in a future state. It is doubtless due to this careful inculcation of a humane spirit at a time when the mind is most impressionable, that the Japanese have become, as all travellers say, the politest of nations. One cannot but hope that the quaint and peaceful charm which results from a universal spirit of kindliness may not pass away with the adoption of modern institutions and modern habits of thought."

CHAPTER VII.

ANOTHER MIGRATION.

AT last, the weary journey came to an end. Their plot of land, allotted to them by Colonial Government was handed over to them, and the name of Salem was given to it at the suggestion of Paul Heck—Salem, the City of Peace! Our little party of Palatines, however, were not destined to find anything but a very temporary and disturbed resting-place by the borders of the Pawlet River. That was not the place where Barbara's mission was to be ultimately fulfilled. But they set themselves to the hard, though congenial, task of making for themselves a home at "Salem." The patch of land apportioned to them was only partially cleared, and the log cabins which were to house their children and their few household goods had to be hewn from the forest trees around them. In time all these primary difficulties were overcome; the soil of their virgin farms was sown with the seed they had brought from Jan Stuyvesant's store on the quay of New York, and the evidences of "home" began again to smile around them.

The seed of the Kingdom, too, was not allowed to remain unscattered. Philip Embury did not need, on this occasion, to be prompted to tell the Gospel story to the scattered colonisers round about them; and Brave Barbara soon constituted herself a volunteer missioner, especially among the women and children, who soon learned to trust her as a teacher, and to love her as a friend. John Lawrence, too, and Michael Finnigan, used to tramp the forest ways for many surrounding miles, visiting distant clearings, Sunday by Sunday, to tell the story of the Cross, and in this primitive fashion was the news of the glad evangel carried to isolated farms and settlements. In the course of the following winter, or rather in the early spring, an event happened that filled the little colony by the Pawlet River with alarm. There swept across the land one of those terrible storms that ever and anon work such wreck aud damage. The winds of the wild north west seemed to have concentrated all their possible currents into one broad rapid rush, as if to leave naught but vacuum behind. A strange conglomerate of rain, hail, snow, now at once, and now in instant succession, descended on the astonished earth. The awful ploughshare of the storm left a pitiful lane of ruin behind it. Huge forest trees had come crashing to the ground, torn up remorselessly by the roots, and even hurled to great distances from the place whereon they grew. Isolated buildings, and even clusters of farmsteads were wholly or partially overthrown, and such as escaped by reason of their position on the fringe of the hurricane, were unroofed. In the centre of the track, on which the blizzard sped, men and women, cattle, goats, and other living things, were lifted from their feet and borne helplessly along, and even men and women, where they had not flung themselves upon their faces, were overthrown.

When the hurricane had spent its force, and its consequences were fairly realized, Philip Embury was missing, and could not be found. On the morning of that tempestuous day, and while yet the sun in the eastern heavens shone out serenely, giving promise of a bright spring day, that good man had gone to the distant settlement of Morristown, some miles away. An elderly member of the little Methodist community of that region was sick unto death, and Philip, who shirked no duty, and lost no opportunity of being about his Master's business, had gone to say good words and offer intercessions by the bedside of the dying man.

In the afternoon of that day, the storm came; and on that evening, our friends were seriously disturbed to find that Philip Embury was still absent from his home. His eldest son, accompanied by John Lawrence, set out to [illegible] that he had remained at Morristown, until the blizzard had passed, and would be plodding homeward under the stars.

In the near neighborhood of Morristown, they received with much distress the news that the missing pastor had left the place before the coming of the hurricane, and that he must have been plodding along the forest ways at the very time that the peals of thunder, the flash of the lightnings, and the crash of the forest trees were making pandemonium all around. John Lawrence and his young companion, made their way, with sad hearts and weary limbs, homewards, along the path of the storm, peering through the darkness and calling out, "Father!" "Philip!" but they heard no voice.

That was indeed a sad home-coming on the part of the young searchers who had lost all heart, and a doubly sad reception that awaited them at Philip Embury's partly demolished homestead, where Mary Embury sat amid the ruins of the blizzard, mourning for her absent husband. Of course, Brave Barbara was by her side. Where was she not, when sorrow made silent cry for sympathy and aid? She, too, was much distressed; not only because of the calamity which had come to so many of her friends and neighbors, but because her own faithful and affectionate protege and helper, Michael Finnigan, had also disappeared.

So the long hours of the night passed by; and in the early morning two or three searchparties were voluntarily organized to discover, if possible the missing pastor. It was not till high noon had come and gone, and not till the sun began to climb down in red mist along the western sky, that their labors were rewarded by answering cry to their anxious calls. Then, in response to their shouts of "Philip! Philip Embury!" and the still louder, "Hallo!" that rang through the broken silence of the wilderness, they heard an answering call, "Here!" "This way!" "Come quickly!" Pressing forward in the direction indicated; forcing their way in and through and over the intervening barriers, their renewed cries brought still nearer and more definite replies. "It's here we are; an' within arm's raich av ye! Glory be to God! Misther Embury, avick! That's the voice o' John Lawrence, so it is; the name of the Lord be praised! Here John, ma bouchal! Here!"

"That's Mike Finnigan!" said John Lawrence, crashing his way through a network of interlacing boughs, and catching at length a glimpse of his Irish comrade, and of Philip Embury, both of them firmly imprisoned in a labyrinth of thick boughs, broken, bent, knotted, twisted in a fashion such as none but the awful strength of a cataclysm could have woven together!

In as little time as strong thews and sinews and the hearty good will of souls alive to the occasion, could accomplish it, the helpless prisoners within the maze were set free from their perilous position, both of them sorely mauled and almost exhausted by their long confinement amid the unyielding mass and the vain struggles they had made to help themselves. Philip Embury was all but spent, and the rest were filled with anxiety as to whether he could bear removal to the settlement. A couple of messengers were sent forward to Salem to fetch the means and comforts that would enable them to bear him home; but Mike, though bruised and bleeding, and pale as death, stoutly maintained that he was "all right," and now that he had got the weight of that "mortial heavy lump av a tree" off his "chist," that he should be "as good a man as the best av 'em; glory be to God."

It appeared that Philip Embury had been caught in the full sweep of the hurricane. The wonder is that he had not been simply crushed to pieces by the awful elemental war which dealt with the forest giants like nine-pins, and sent them spinning from their places along the groove its resistless course had made. Though he was sorely handled, however, the hurly-burly was, in a sense, his shelter; for the tangle of boughs which had beaten him down hemmed him in, canopied him, and saved him from being dashed to pieces by the wrath of the [illegible]

When Michael Finnigan knew that he was missing, the brave and energetic youth hastened off to Morristown to meet him. The remainder of his day's provision in the field, consisting of bread and cheese and a bottle of "herb-tea"—a grateful and pleasant decoction of "Misthress Barbara's" was still in his possession, and with this he hurried off.

Surely it was a gracious providence that directed him almost straight to the forest-prison in which his friend and pastor was confined. Calling Embury's name loudly and continuously, he was answered at last by the welcome sound of Philip's voice. It was some time before he actually discovered his whereabouts, though he felt that it surely rose from the shapeless heap on which his eyes were fixed. When the truth dawned upon him, with all the hot and generous impulsiveness of his true Irish heart, he thrust his way as closely as his strength would permit to Philip's side. He could touch him, but he could not quite reach him. With all the strength of his muscle he essayed to push away an intervening bough, and succeeded too effectually. It fell forward, and in so doing another unyielding branch pressed down on him;—he, too, became a prisoner, and as his struggles only served to increase the load he wisely resolved to hoard his strength for the sake of the weaker and less capable comrade at his side.

There is little question that Lucky Mike, though himself a prisoner, and with only limited use of his limbs, did really save the life of Philip Embury. The provisions he had brought broke the long fast of the bruised and weary pastor—a fast which in his frail condition might well have been fatal. Michael was able, also, to use his arms in clearing away the smaller twigs and branches from the head and shoulders of his companion in distress; and what was most likely best of all, he kept poor Philip in heart and cheer.

At last the removal of Philip Embury to his home was acomplished. Borne on a sort of traveling ambulance, consisting of the broad branches of the pines, overlaid with blankets, and the shoulders of strong men, he was once again taken beneath his own roof, and attended with loving care by Brave Barbara, by John Lawrence and Michael Finnigan, in whose loving labors, the distressed and anxoious Mary saw and felt to the full the worth and beauty of "practical Christianity." Thanks to the tender care and loving ministrations of devoted friends and a grateful people, Philip Embury rapidly became convalescent, and eventually, indeed, reached a condition of health and vigor to which he had for some time been a stranger.

Nearer and nearer, during these prosperous years was the war cloud traveling; blacker and more thickly it loomed over the thriving colonies of the West, and our Palatine friends at Salem, much distressed, harassed, vexed in spirit by the quarrelsome and rebellious spirit that filled the social air that entered into the market, and gravely influenced the otherwise quiet life of field and farm.

The Hecks, the Embury's the Schweitzers, and others who formed one community of blood, of dialect, of faith, were sore flustered and unsettled. Barbara Heck and her husband were among the first to fix their desires on a still more westerly and distant "land of rest." In Canada, they thought, their loyalty of heart and love of peace would find a congenial habitation; and thither, they suggested, the little colony should go. Philip Embury, whose goods and gear, whose lands and stock was steadily growing, was loth to leave his Salem farm

"Nay, dear heart," he said to his sweet wife, who was a good deal unnerved and timorous by reason of the rumors of outbreak and serious collision that had reached the quiet valley in which they dwelt —"Nay, dear heart, this is only some temporary tumult, raised by the commercial disaffection of interested and selfish men. The colonists, as a body, will never rebel."

Hopeful Philip Embury was wrong. That loyal heart did not rightly interpret the signs of the times. The country was ripe for revolt; the actual crash of conflict, however, did not come until Philip Embury had passed into the Land of Peace. In the summer of 1775, Philip Embury was busy in the harvest-field, when an "accident" occurred that put a sudden and unexpected end to his career. He was riding, it would seem, on the top of the wagon, on which he was piling the spoils of harvest. A broken wheel, or a hole in the stubble, led to his being violently thrown down. The blade of a scythe, the prongs of a fork, or some other harvest tool lazily left where it had no business to be, became the unconscious weapon of destruction, and Philip passed to the place "where beyond these voices there is peace!"

His last hours, like the "passing of Arthur," was the going forth of a hero. Taking affectionate leave of Barbara Heck, he said, "Farewell, dearest of friends, most faithful of helpers, and true mother in Israel. Grace and peace be multiplied to you and yours, as they surely will be. Keep heart of cheer, Brave Barbara, the Lord hath yet much labor for thy loving heart and songful tongue, and also, much reward." To John Lawrence he committed the charge of his weeping wife and family. To his gentle and loving Mary, he could say but little; for the deep stream of his affections, generally still, as deep streams are seemed to stagnate into silence by the very excess and power of its emotions. "My Mary," said he, as his pale face quivered, and his voice sank into a whisper, "Beloved wife of my heart! I leave you and my children to the sure care of our common Father. All is well with me; all will be with you. All is well!"

After he had committed the whole group gathered round his bed to the Father's care, in words that went to every heart, he said, "And now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy Word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Then the silence fell, the saint was sent for, and it seemed as though "a glory shone around."

The burial of this pioneer apostle of the West was in keeping with his humble life and influential career. Like the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham took possession of for the inheritance of Canaan, the simple grave of Embury held the whole land of the new continent in fee for Jesus. It was dug in his own field, as was the case with the Primitive settlers. All the neighborhood was present at his burial, and on the quiet waters of the beautiful Pawlet River, and across the virgin farms of Salem, and through the forest-trees of God's fair temple round, the echoes of Philip Embury's burial song floated on the air.

It is needless to say that it was not without a sore heart-wrench and serious loss that our emigrants left the smiling fields and pleasant homes of Salem. They had made the one, and reared the other, with their own toilsome hands, and the pleasant banks of the Pawlet River had grown to be truly dear. Their beloved dead, too, and especially their loved and lamented pastor slepr there, and they fain would have dwelt there still, if they might dwell in peace.

Peace, however, Paul Heck's supreme delight, seemed to have fled the land in general, and Salem in particular, for the neighbors, who had no grateful memories to fall back upon, were insurgents to a man; and not content with being warriors and war-like themselves, "made it hot" for our Methodist German-Irishmen because they would not tie the red ribbon on their hat. Persecution grew bad to bear among the disturbed and fractious settlers of the Pawlet River, and so, with one consent, Paul Heck and his companions resolved to "Arise and go." For conscience sake, therefore, the Hecks, accompanied by Mary Embury and her children, and by John Lawrence and Michael Finnigan, turned their faces to the distant north. They sold their flocks and herds and farming gear at great sacrifice, to their revolutionary neighbors, who, while they respected their character and esteemed their consistency, were not unwilling to make a gain out of what they called "such fanatical loyalty." When the wheat harvest had been reaped, our exiles reserved sufficient for their provision during the long journey that lay before them, and turned the rest into money to swell the little hoard which should smooth their way in the new lands whither they were bound.

Two large, rough and unwieldy barges, or flat-bottomed boats called "bateaux," had been provided for the long journey over unknown waters to the loyal province of Lower Canada. In them were placed what they had reserved for household gear—such as bedding and other comforts; their stock of wearing apparel, and such portable property as had become endeared to them by use and memory. Among the most precious articles of faith was Barbara Heck's talisman, the dear old German Bible, the latest hymn book, sent to them from New York by the sweet singer, David Schweitzer—who was destined to join them at a future day—also Philip Embury's much-prized "Cruden's Concordence," in its strong calf-binding and enclosed in a bag of black glazed linen, stitched together by the deft fingers of his widow.

A comfortable nest was made for the five children of Paul and Barbara Heck. The eldest was a bright eyed lassie of ten; then came three boys of eight, six and four; a laughing, black-eyed little girl of two summers bringing up the rear.

Paul Heck and John Lawrence had charge of the oars, and Lucky Mike, who declared himself luckier than ever, now that "the Misthress" found him so useful, was "odd man" for any and every service.

Such was the little pioneer party, which was snugly stowed away on the two bateaux, when a band of sympathetic friends and neighbors came to see them off, and to say that sadly familiar word in this changeful world, "Goodbye." The "good Word" was read, prayer was offered, then the last words of farewell were spoken, and the voices of friends on shore blended with those on board in parting song.

The Garden Tomb.

Agnes Ben-Oliel Writes an Interesting Letter on the Much-Discussed Topic.

"NOW in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid" (John 19: 41). Whose was this garden? Clearly, I think, Joseph's of Arimathea. Was it at all likely that the wealthy Joseph, an honorable counselor, would dig "his own new tomb" (Matt. 26: 60) in another man's garden? And if the garden was his, it and the sepulchre remained his private property after the Lord's resurrection; and it would continue to be the private property of himself, or of some one else, till the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, some forty years after the crucifixion.

Whether Joseph was afterward interred "in his own new tomb," which he had excavated expressly for himself; or whether he and Nicodemus, another "honorable counselor"—member of the Sanhedrim—and secret disciple of the Lord Jesus, having by their loving burial of the dear Master become identified publicly with his claim to the Messiahship, were involved in the persecution of the disciples by the arrogant and corrupt priests, scribes and pharisees consequent on Stephen's martyrdom, we know not. More likely it is that they became popular with the multitude, who loved and adored Jesus more than any prophet that ever trod the land of Israel, by their reverential burial of him whom the oldest rabbinic writings recognize and acknowledge as a scion of the royal house of David, inasmuch as they record that he was taken down from the cross early, "for it was not seemly that a member of the royal family should remain on it till sunset, like a common malefactor," and particularly when it became generally known that Joseph had dissented from "the counsel and deed" of the nefarious priests (Luke 23: 50).

Possibly Joseph would esteem it a high honor to be wherein the sacred body of his Lord and Saviour had been laid (see 1. Kings 13: 31); and it is certain he would consider the spot too holy to permit any one else to be buried in it, perhaps not even himself.

Buried in the very Tomb

What appears positive and indubitable is, that this garden was not a public cemetery at all, and could not become such till long after the destruction of the city; and then, it seems to me highly questionable that after Titus' terrible siege, the obstinate defense and final complete overthrow of Jerusalem, any garden in the immediate vicinity of the city would remain intact and recognizable.

We know that after Stephen's martyrdom "there was a great persecution against the church, which was at Jerusalem; and they"—the disciples—"were all"—(note well all), "except the apostles" scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria" (Acts 8: 1), and were preaching the Gospel to "Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch," and we know, also, that the apostles and disciples quitted Jerusalem before the siege, and took refuge at Pella and other places beyond Jordan. Did any ever return to Jerusalem? It seems highly doubtful. And if any did, say at the rebuilding of the city by Adrian, sixty years after, they could hardly have been of the generation that witnessed the crucifixion and resurrection.

Now, the ground immediately surrounding Golgotha on the west is honey-combed with rock-cut tombs, and there is every indication that it has been a public cemetery from time immemorial. For all these reasons, the idea that Joseph's garden was in immediate proximity—in actual contact, in fact—of the defiled, disreputable, accursed Place of Stoning, appears to me preposterous and incredible. No tomb close to that desecrated, ignominious mound could possibly be Joseph's "own new tomb" in his own private garden. To me, a Hebrew, the supposition appears inconceivable and most incongruous, and I feel it a solemn duty to raise my humble voice against the perpetration of a great, lamentable and by fellow-evangelical Christians. I entreat them to pause and reconsider the subject prayerfully and more seriously before they set up another Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

Across the narrow road leading to this so-called "Garden of Calvary" of a few Protestants, is the extensive property of the Dominicans, surrounded by solid walls, inside which are seen the ruined foundations of the church built in the middle of the fifth century on the traditional site of St. Stephen's martyrdom,—a very likely spot, for it is close to the Jewish Place of Stoning—to Golgotha; and M. Heydet's pamphlet seems conclusive on the point. This ground is honey-combed with rock-cut tombs, in some places tier above tier. It is here that a tomb, it is said, has been discovered with an inscription stating: "To Nonus and Onesimus, deacons of the church of the witness of the resurrection of Christ, buried near their Lord." I have more than once tried to inspect this tomb and inscription, said to be in a particular vault; but the key is not forthcoming—it is always in the custody of a monk, absent at the time. I must try again, and till then I must reserve my opinion or judgment. No date is alleged, and that is a very material point.

The Dominicans have just finished building a very handsome college. They have several other structures on their property, and are collecting for the rebuilding of the Basilica on its ancient foundations. I dare say they will accomplish their purpose long before the urgently-needed Evangelical Christian-Union Hall is reared in Jerusalem!

Mount Zion.

"Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north—the city of the Great King" (Psalm 48: 2). The turning-point in all discussions on topographic and archæologic subjects regarding Jerusalem is the exact situation of Mount Zion. The above-quoted Psalm says it is "on the sides of the north;" but guide books, dragomen and people generally, now-a-days, say it is on the southwest; there is no question respecting Mount Moriah; all are agreed it is the southeast peak of the ridge—the present harem area; but while the Bible, Josephus and all ancient writers place Mount Zion to the north, or, to be geographically precise, to northwest of Morian, most writers and most people say it is the western ridge. It is marvelous how easily people are carried away by common, or popular, assumptions! We know, or ought to know, that in the days of the Maccabees—of Simon—the population of Jerusalem worked day and night during three whole years to reduce Mount Zion—the city of David—the Akra—to a lower level than the Temple peak; but, the present so-called Zion is still higher!

Till this fact of the true location of Mount Zion is grasped clearly and distinctly, the topography of Jerusalem is a muddle full of contradictions, inconsistencies, incongruities, and at utter variance with the Scriptures.

Since writing these "random thoughts," I have read the pamphlet of the Rev. Haskett Smith, author of Murray's Handbook to Syria and Palestine. He is a strong partisan of the tomb in the presumed "Garden of Calvary." Alas! that so many learned men should be still seeking the living, risen Saviour, among the dead! Dr. Cachet's objection is overwhelmingly conclusive against that, or any other tomb in proximity and contact with the "Place of Stoning."

A Pleasant Festival.

On the 11th of January our mission had what was called an entertainment for the mothers of our sewing meeting and their children. Though it had been postponed on account of the non-arrival of some of the toys, it was, we think, quite as well appreciated and enjoyed as if it had taken place earlier. About two o'clock the poor Jewesses began to arrive, some bringing two or three children out of their numerous families, and one woman leading her blind husband who seemed to enjoy it all.

Miss Ben-Oliel is now in England, working up an interest in the Jews among Sunday Schools and branches of the Y. W. C. A. She is very anxious to start a class for teaching the elder girls how to earn their living by dressmaking. A young Christian widow, without children, has offered herself for this work, but we are waiting to find means for her support before bringing her out. For this and materials for the mothers' meetings and the general expenses of the mission, funds are needed.

The Last Ditch.

That's about the condition of many of the patients that come to Drs. Starkey & Palen, the discoverers and only dispensers of Compound Oxygen. They have been the rounds—tried the suggestions of friends, the stock of the druggist and the skill of the family doctor. Nothing but the most wonderful healing agent in the world would be able to cope with these abandoned cases. Yet its surprising record of cures is made largely from this class. The power of this simple agent to restore and heal, taxed the credulity of the Doctors themselves for years. They have, therefore, the greatest patience with those who hear of its wonderful cures for the first time, and only ask that they will not, even it in the last ditch, give up in despair, but write for proof in the very words of well-known people who have been restored to good health after having been given up by others. Address with particulars, Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, or Chicago, San Francisco, New York, and Toronto, Ont.

Thin Children Grow Fat

on Scott's Emulsion, because fat foods make fat children. They are thin, and remain thin just in proportion to their inability to assimilate food rich in fat.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil is especially adaptable to those of weak digestion—it is partly digested already. Astonishing how quickly a thin person gains solid flesh by its use!

Almost as palatable as milk.

A STRANGE GUIDE.

LONDON is famous for the density of its fogs, but last winter they were worse than usual. In February, especially, they were numerous, and some of them so heavy and black, that men familiar with the city streets often times lost their way. One curious incident of the time is reported. It was that of a business man, who took a wrong turning on his way home and was completely lost. Hearing a footstep approaching, he waited, and asked the man who came up, if he knew where they were.

"Perfectly," was the reply, "where do you desire to go?"

The gentleman told him without hesitation, and laughingly explained that it was his own house he was trying to find. "Ah," said the stranger, cheerily, "that is almost at hand. Trust yourself to me, and I will lead you to your door." Arrived there, he accepted the gentleman's thanks, and then laughingly said, "I dare say, if you had known what I am, you would have hesitated to place yourself under my care." "That would have depended," replied the gentleman, now eyeing his rescuer furtively. "Well, I think you would," said the other, "for I am blind."

It was certainly a curious and unusual situation, that of a blind man leading one who could see. Yet it is perfectly credible, as walking in the dense fog required the exercise of faculties much more fully developed in a blind man than in one who could see. The same principle holds in spiritual things. It is not the wise and prudent who find their way to Christ, but the child-like who with implicit confidence, are accustomed to walk by faith, not by sight.

New California

$50 a share.

The best California product, so far, is oranges, lemons, prunes, figs, olives, grapes, almonds, etc. The fruit-growing center is in the southern part, at Riverside. Unimproved land there is worth $200 to $600 an acre. An acre of orchard yields $100 to $2,500 a year.

A still better place for these fruits and nuts is about to be opened 150 miles southeast, along the Southern Pacific R.R. The first thing to do is to water the land by canal from the Colorado River, a quick and easy job, involving great profit. Unlimited fruit land; nothing but water lacking, ready to plant as soon as the water is there; and car-loads of vegetables will grow between trees in three to six months.

The most precious thing in the world is water, and that is our merchandise. It enriches all that buy or sell it. With water, within five years, the land will bring $500 an acre, some of it. Water creates incredible values.

We want a share of our stock in good hands at every post-office. In a year we shall want the people to know we are ready for settlers.

Send for pamphlet and map. We want you to know what wealth and health await our partners and customers there.

Count Up

the number of times you have to rub a garment to get it clean; multiply it by the number of garments washed in a year.

Then you can see just how many back-breaking rubs Pearline will save you, annually. You don't do the washing yourself? That doesn't make any difference. You need Pearline just the same. Every one of these tiresome rubs is wear and tear on the things that are washed. They suffer, even if you don't. Hundreds of millions of packages of Pearline have been consumed. Think of the number of useless and harmful rubs that have been saved to the women of America.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 384 JAMES PYLE, New York of carrying fine goods is part of the cost. Every time you bump a high-priced watch it costs you four dollars. Don't you realize that you would be better off with an every-day watch for the wear and tear?—as an accurate jeweled timepiece, and equal in looks with the other, can be bought for $15 down to $4: the new, quick-winding Waterbury, winds in five seconds. Don't forget the name.

All jewelers keep it; in all styles: Gold, filled, (14-karat,) coin-silver, etc. Both ladies' and gentlemen's watches. 33

A REMARKABLE ESCAPE.

In answering a question as to the protecting care of God over his people, a Moravian teacher related the following incidents: "A little child, while out gathering wild strawberries, fell down a deep shaft, which had been covered with a rotten lid. The mother, knowing the great depth of the shaft, thought her child hopelessly lost, and the agonized father prayed God to take her painlessly to himself. It was, he thought, useless to ask for her preservation. But a miner in the neighborhood was fetched, and on being let down by a rope into the shaft, he found the child alive and unhurt, having been caught midway by its clothes on a projecting nail. As he released the little skirt, the nail itself gave way, but it had held fast until its preserving work was done. The little girl thus marvelously saved became the mother of a famous Magdeburg general.

MR. SESSIONS LEAVES AFRICA.

MR. JOHN CATLINE, a reader of this paper, writes us that letters have been received giving later news of the Sessions family. "We have learned through some of the Christian Alliance Missionaries who went out in the steamer Majestic, soon after them," he writes, "that they were about a hundred miles up the Congo and that Mr. Sessions had been quite sick, and was cried by bearers to a steamer to return to America. His adopted son Nathan had lately died and his neice, Myrtle Perry, was quite sick. Of the other members of the family nothing was said. So much I have learned from letters written Feb. 10, and just received. We are informed, also, that there have been five deaths among those who went out in the Majestic."

Pears' Soap

People have no idea how crude and cruel soap can be.

It takes off dirt. So far, so good; but what else does it do?

It cuts the skin and frets the under-skin; makes redness and roughness and leads to worse. Not soap, but the alkali in it.

Pears' Soap has no free alkali in it. It neither reddens nor roughens the skin. It responds to water instantly; washes and rinses off in a twinkling; is as gentle as strong; and the after-effect is every way good.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

Fahys

It is all very well to say "handsome is that handsome does," but most of us want both, and that's what a Fahys Monarch 14 karat Watch Case is and does. IN ANCIENT LYDDA.

Surrounded by Orchards and Gardens and Still Beautiful even in Decay—St. George's Birthplace and the Scene of Peter's Visit and the Healing of Aeneas, the Paralytic—One of the Oldest of Old World Cities.

PASSING about nine miles east of Joppa, through the region of Palestine known as the Shephelah, or "Low Lands," and through waving corn-fields, green pastures and olive-girt villages, there is no more picturesque or attractive sight that greets the eye of the traveler to Jerusalem than the white walls and shining domes of ancient Lydda. He approaches through a mile of beautiful orchards and gardens, which enclose the town on all sides except the east, which lies close to the hills. Lydda, which received its name from the Hebrew word "Lod," lies within the limits of the tribe of Ephraim. It appears to have been first built by the Benjamites, although it lay beyond the limits of their territory (1. Chron. 8 : 12). At a later date, its inhabitants are mentioned among those who were sold into slavery by Cassius when he inflicted the calamity of his presence upon Palestine after the death of Julius Caesar, as told by Josephus, the celebrated Jewish historian.

In the New Testament, Lydda is referred to as the scene of Peter's miraculous healing of the paralytic Æneas (Acts 9 : 32—35.) The apostle, on leaving "the saints in Lydda," went to Joppa, where the generous-hearted Dorcas had fallen sick and died (Acts 9 : 38). Later, as we learn from Josephus, Lydda or Lydd (as it is called at the present time by the natives of Palestine) was reduced to ashes by Cestius Gallus, on his march against Jerusalem. However it soon revived, for not long after, we find it at the head of one of the toparchies or states of later Judaea. At that time it is described by Josephus as a village equal to a city, and the Rabbins have much to say of it as a seat of Jewish learning. One of the interesting incidents in the Talmud states that Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, had celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles there. We learn further, that Lydda became known as Diospolis, in the general change that took place under the Roman dominion.

St. George, the martyr, who was not less renowned in the East than afterward in the West (and who was known to the Moslems as El-Khudr), is said to have been born in Lydda. He suffered martyrdom in Nicomedia, but his remains were carried to his native town, and his head is said to have been buried below the altar of the church consecrated to his memory by Justinian. This church, which stood outside the town, was levelled to the ground by the Moslems during the Crusader wars; but was afterwards rebuilt. The Crusaders invested the martyr with the dignity of their patron, and he afterward became the patron saint of England and of several other states and kingdoms. The church mentioned was finally destroyed by the famous Moslem warrior, Salah-Ed-Deen, in 1191. There is another fine church at Lydda which dates from about A. D. 1150, and which contains a crypt with what is called St. George's Tomb, but the authenticity of the latter is doubtful.

The population of Lydda is between 4,000 and 5,000. It is noted by the neighboring towns and villages for its delicious prickly-pears, cantilopes and water-melons. With side-baskets big enough to hold 2,000 prickly-pears, loaded on donkey-back, the Lyddians are seen in summer time—sometimes fifty or more together—on their way to Ramleh, Jaffa or Jerusalem, to sell their fruits.

It is related that one of the earliest American Presbyterian missionaries in Syria when a prickly-pear was handed to him for the first time, wondered how he was to eat it. He began to drop out seed after seed of the curious fruit, and so continued until there was nothing left in his hand.

What can one have of this fruit?" he asked in surprise. "I threw the seeds away, and there, I have nothing left." His host told him with a smile that the seeds he had thrown away were the eatable substance of the prickly-pear, whereupon the missionary laughed good naturedly at his own mistake. A popular proverb grew out of this prickly-pear incident and to-day they say in Syria: "So-and-so is just like Thompson's prickly-pear," when a thing is not used in the proper way and the result is the total loss of it. Very unhandy are these prickly-pears, as they are covered with thin and nearly invisible thorns and when the Lyddians cut off the fruit, the wind blows the fine points into their faces. Those thorns sting like bees, and when, as often happens, they come into the eye, blindness is the result. Eye-disease is widely prevalent in Lydda, because of this peculiarity of the prickly-pear. A Lyddian is known wherever he goes, his eyes bearing witness for him. Nowadays, comparatively few pilgrims visiting the Holy Land call at Lydda on their way to Jerusalem. The village is on the line of railway which was constructed last year, between Jaffa and the "City of David."

The Tabernacle Pulpit

OVER ALL FOREVER.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text, Romans 9: 5, "Christ came, who is over all."

FOR four thousand years the world had been waiting for a deliverer—waiting while empires rose and fell. Conquerors came and made the world worse instead of making it better, still the centuries watched and waited. They looked for him on thrones, looked for him in palaces, looked for him in imperial robe, looked for him at the head of armies. At last they found him in a barn. The cattle stood nearer to him than the angels, for the former were in the adjoining stall while the latter were in the clouds. A parentage of peasantry. No room for him in the inn, because there was no one to pay the hotel expense. Yet the pointing star and the angelic cantata showed that heaven made up in appreciation of his worth what the world lacked. "Christ came, who is over all, God blessed forever. Amen."

But who is this Christ who came? As to the difference between different denominations of evangelical Christians I have no concern. If I could, by the turning over of my hand, decide whether all the world shall at last be Baptist, or Methodist, or Congregational, or Episcopalian, or Presbyterian, I would not turn my hand. But there are doctrines which are vital to the soul. If Christ be not a God, we are idolaters. To this Christological question I devote myself this morning, and pray God that we may think aright and do aright in regard to a question in which mistake is infinite.

I suppose that the majority of those here to-day assembled believe the Bible. It requires as much faith to be an infidel as to be a Christian. It is faith in a different direction. The Christian has faith in the teachings of Matthew, Luke, John, Paul, Isaiah, Moses. The infidel has faith in the freethinkers. We have faith in one class of men. They have faith in another class of men. But as the majority of those, perhaps all of those here assembled, are willing to take the Bible for a standard in morals and in faith, I make this book my starting-point.

I suppose you are aware that the two generals who have marshalled the great armies against the deity of Jesus Christ are Strauss and Renan. The number of their slain will not be counted until the trumpet of the archangel sounds the roll-call of the resurrection. Those men and their sympathizers saw that if they could destroy the fortress of the miracles they could destroy Christianity, and they were right. Surrender the miracles and you surrender Christianity. The great German exegete says that all the miracles were myths. The great French exegete says that all the miracles were legends. They propose to take everything supernatural from the life of Christ, and everything supernatural from the Bible. They prefer the miracles of human nonsense to the glorious miracles of Jesus Christ.

They say there was no miraculous birth in Bethlehem, but that it is all a fanciful story, just like the story of Romulus said to have been born of Rea Silvia and the god Mars. They say no star pointed to the manger; it was only the flash of a passing lantern. They say there was no miraculous making of bread, but that it is a corruption of the story that Elisha gave twenty loaves of bread to a hundred men. They say the water was never turned into wine, but that it is a corruption of the story that the Egyptian plague turned the water into blood. They say it is no wonder that Christ sweat great drops of blood; he had been out in the night air and was taken suddenly ill. They say that there were no tongues of fire on the heads of the disciples at the Pentecost; that there was only a great thunder storm, and the air was full of electricity which snapped and flew all around about the heads of the disciples. They say that Mary and Martha and Christ felt it important to get up an excitement for the forwarding of their religion, and so they dramatized a funeral and Lazarus played the corpse, and Mary and Martha played the weepers, and Christ was the tragedian. I put it in my own words, but this is the exact meaning of their statements. They say the Bible is a spurious book written by superstitious or lying men, backed up by men who died for that which they did not believe.

Now, I take back the limited statement which I made a few moments ago, when I said it requires as much faith to be an infidel as to be a Christian. It requires a thousand-fold more faith to be an infidel than to be a Christian. for if Christianity demand that the whale swallowed Jonah, then Scepticism demands that Jonah swallowed the whale! I can prove to you that Christ was God, not only by the supernatural appearances on that Christmas night, but by what inspired men said of him, by what he says of himself, and by his wonderful achievements. "Christ came, who is over all." Ah! does not that prove too much? Not over the Cæsars, not over Frederick, not over Alexander the Great, not over the Henrys, not over the Louises? Yes. Pile all the thrones of all the ages together, and my text overspans them as easily as a rainbow overspans a mountain-top. "Christ came, who is over all." Then he must be a God.

The Bible says that all things were made by him. Does not that prove too much? Could it be that he made the Mediterranean, that he made the Black Sea, that he made the Atlantic, the Pacific, that he made Mount Lebanon, that he made the Alps, the Sierra Nevadas, that he made the hemispheres, that he made the universe? Yes. The Bible says so, and lest we be too stupid to understand, John winds up with a magnificent reiteration, and says: "Without him was not anything made that was made." Then he was a God.

The Bible says at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow. All heaven must come down on its knees. Martyrs on their knees, apostles on their knees, confessors on their knees, the archangel on his knees. Before whom? a man? No, he is a God. The Bible says every tongue shall confess—Bornesian, Malayan, Mexican, Italian, Spanish, Persian, English. Every tongue shall confess. To whom? God. The Bible says Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Is that characteristic of humanity? Do we not change? Does not the body entirely change in seven years? Does not the mind change? Does not the heart change? Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. He must be a God.

Philosophers say that the law of gravitation decides everything, and that the centripetal and centrifugal forces keep the world from clashing and from demolition. But Paul says that Christ's arm is the axle on which everything turns, and that Christ's hand is the socket in which everything is set. Mark the words, "Upholding—upholding all things by the word of his power." Then he must be a God.

Then look at what Christ says of himself. Now, certainly everyone must understand himself better than any one else can understand him. If I ask you where you were born, and you tell me, "I was born in Chester, England," or "I was born in Glasgow, Scotland," or "I was born in Dublin, Ireland," or "I was born in New Orleans, the United States," you being a man of integrity, I should believe you. If I asked you how many pounds you could lift, and you should say you could lift one hundred pounds, or two hundred pounds, or three hundred pounds, I should believe you. It is a matter personal to yourself. You know better than anyone else can tell you. If I ask how much estate you are worth, and you say $10,000, or $100,000, or $500,000, I believe what you say. You know better than anyone else. Now Christ must know better than anyone else who he is and what he is. When I ask him how old he is, he says: "Before Abraham was, I am." Abraham had been dead 2028 years. Was Christ 2028 years old? Yes, he says he is older than that. "Before Abraham was, I am." Then Christ says, "I am the Alpha." Alpha is the first letter of the Greek alphabet, and Christ in that utterance declared, "I am the A of the alphabet of the centuries." Then he must be a God. Can a man be in a thousand places at once? Christ says he is in a thousand places at once. "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." This everywhereativeness, is it characteristic of a man or of a God? And lest we might think this everywhereativeness would cease, he goes on and he intimates that he will be in all the cities of the earth—he will be in Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America the day before the world burns up. "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Why, then, he must be a God.

Besides that, he takes divine honors. He declares himself Lord of men, angels, and devils. Is he? If he is, he is a God. If he is not, he is an impostor. A man comes into your store to-morrow morning. He says, "I am the great shipbuilder of Liverpool; I have built hundreds of ships." He goes on to give his experience. You defer to him as a man of large experience and great possessions. But the next day you find out that he is not the great shipbuilder of Liverpool, that he never built a ship, that he never built anything. What is he then? An impostor. Christ says he built this world; he built all things. Did he build them? If he did he is a God. If he did not he is an impostor.

A man comes into your place of business, with a Jewish countenance and a German accent, and says, "I am Rothschild, the banker of London; I have the wealth of nations in my pocket; I loaned that large amount to Italy and Austria in their perplexity." But after awhile you find that he has never loaned any money to Italy or Austria, that he never had a large estate, that he is no banker at all, that he owns nothing. What is he? An impostor. Christ says he owns the cattle on a thousand hills, he owns this world, he owns the next world, he owns the universe, he is the banker of all nations. Is he? If he is, he is a God. Is he not? Then he is an impostor.

A man enters the White House at Washington. He says, "I am Emperor William of Germany; I am traveling incognito; I have come over here for recreation and pleasure; I own castles in Dresden and Berlin." But the President finds out the next day that he is not Emperor William, that he owns no castles at Berlin or Dresden, that he has no authority. What is he? An impostor. Christ says he is the King over all, the King immortal, invisible. If he is, he is a God. If he is not, he is an impostor.

Strauss saw that alternative, and he tries to get out of it by saying that Christ was sinful in accepting adoration and worship. Renan tries to get out of it by saying that Christ—not through any fault of his own, but through the fault of others—lost his purity of conscience, and he slyly intimates that dishonorable women had damaged his soul. Anything but believe that Christ is God. Now you believe the Bible to be true. If you do not you would hardly have appeared in this church. You would have gone over and joined the Broadway Infidel Club, or you would go to Boston and kiss the foot of the statue of Thomas Paine. You would hardly come into this church, where the most of us are the deluded souls who believe in a whole Bible and take it all down as easily as you swallow a ripe strawberry. I have shown you what inspired men said of Christ, I have shown you what Christ said of himself; now if you believe the Bible, let us go out and see his wonderful achievements — surgical, alimentary, marine, mortuary. Surgical achievements: Where is the medical journal that gives any account of such exploits as Christ wrought? He used no knife. He carried no splints. He employed no compress. He made no patient squirm under cauterization. He tied no artery. Yet behold him! With a word he stuck fast Malchus's amputated ear. He stirred a little dust and spittle into a salve and with it caused a man who was born blind, and without optic nerve, or cornea, or crystalline lens, to open his eyes on the sunlight. He beat music on the drum of the deaf ear. He straightened a woman who through contraction of muscle had been bent almost double for well-nigh two decades. He made a man who had no use of his limbs for thirty-eight years shoulder his mattress and walk off.

Sir Astley Cooper, Abernethy, Valentine Mott stood powerless before a withered arm; but this doctor of omnipotent surgery comes in and he sees the paralytic arm useless and lifeless at the man's side, and Christ says to him: "Stretch forth thine hand, and he stretched it forth whole as the other." He was a God.

Alimentary achievements. He found a lad who had come out of the wilderness with five loaves of bread for a speculation. Perhaps the lad had paid five pennies for the five loaves, and expected to sell them for ten pennies, and so he would double his money. Christ took those loaves of bread and performed a miracle by which he fed seven thousand famishing people, and I warrant you the lad lost nothing, for there were twelve baskets of fragments taken up, and if the boy had five loaves at the start, I warrant you he had at least ten at the close.

The Saviour's mother goes into a neighbor's house to help get up a wedding party. By calculation she finds out that the amount of wine is not sufficient for the guests. She calls in Christ for help, and Christ, not by the slow decay of fermentation, but by a word, makes one hundred and thirty gallons of pure wine.

Marine achievements. He turns a whole school of fish into the net of men who were mourning over their poor luck, until the boat is so full they have to halloo to other boats, and the other boats come up and they are laden to the water's edge with the game, so that the sailors have to be cautious in going from larboard to starboard lest they upset the ship. Then there comes a squall down through the mountain gorge, and Gennesaret with long locks of white foam rises up to battle it, and the boat drops into a trough and ships a sea, and the loosened sails crack in the tornado, and Christ rises from the back part of the boat and comes walking across the staggering ship until he comes to the prow, and there he wipes the spray from his brow and hushes the crying storm on the knee of his omnipotence. Who wrestled down that euroclydon? Whose feet trampled the rough Galilee into a smooth floor?

Let philosophers and anatomists go to Westminster Abbey and try to wake up Queen Elizabeth or Henry VIII. No human power ever wakened the dead. There is a dead girl in Capernaum. What does Christ do? Alas! that she should have died so young and when the world was so fair. Only twelve years of age. Feel her cold brow and cold hands. Dead, dead! The house is full of weeping. Christ comes and he takes hold of the hand of the dead girl, and instantly her eyes open, her heart starts. The white lily of death blushes into the rose of life and health. She rushes into the arms of her rejoicing kindred. Who woke up that death? Who restored her to life? A man? Tell that to the lunatics in Bloomingdale Asylum. It was Christ the God.

But there comes a test which more than anything else will show whether he was God or man. You remember that great passage which says: "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ." The earth will be stunned by a blow that will make it stagger mid-heaven; the stars will circle like dry leaves in an equinox; the earth will unroll the bodies, and the sky will unroll the spirits, and soul and flesh will come into incorruptible conjunction. Day of smoke and fire and darkness and triumph. On one side, piled up in galleries of light, the one hundred and forty and four thousand, yea, the quintillions of the saved. On the other side, piled up in galleries of darkness, the frowning, the glaring multitude of those who rejected God.

Between these two piled-up galleries a throne, a high throne, a throne standing on two burnished pillars—Justice, Mercy,—a throne so bright you had better hide your eye lest it be extinguished with excess of vision. But it is an empty throne. Who will come up and take it? Will you?

"Ah! no," you say, "I am but a child of dust; I would not dare to climb that throne." Would Gabriel climb it? He dare not. Who will ascend it? Here comes one. His back is to us. He goes up step above step, height above height, until he reaches the apex. Then he turns around and faces all nations, and we all see who it is. It is Christ, the God, and all earth, and all heaven, and all hell kneel, crying: "It is a God! it is a God!" We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ.

Oh, I am so glad that it is a Divine Being who comes to pardon all our sins, to comfort all our sorrows. Sometimes our griefs are so great they are beyond any human sympathy, and we want Almighty sympathy. Oh, ye who cried all last night because of bereavement or loneliness, I want to tell you it is an omnipotent Christ who is come.

When the children are in the house and the mother is dead, the father has to be more gentle in the home and he has to take the office of father and mother, and it seems to me Christ looks out upon your helplessness and he proposes to be father and mother to your soul. He comes in the strength of the one, in the tenderness of the other. He says with one breath, "As a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him," and then with the next breath he says, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." Do you not feel the hush of the divine lullaby? Oh, put your tired head down on the heaving bosom of divine compassion while he puts his arms around you and says: "O widowed soul, I will be thy God. O orphaned soul, I will be thy protector. Do not cry." Then he touches your eyelids with his fingers, and sweeps his fingers down your cheek, and wipes away all the tears of loneliness and bereavement. Oh, what a tender and sympathetic God has come for us. I do not ask you to lay hold of him. I do not ask you to pray. Perhaps you are too bewildered for that. I only ask you to let go and fall back into the arms of everlasting love.

Soon you and I will hear the click of the latch on the door of the sepulchre. Strong men will take us in their arms and carry us down and lay us in the dust, and they cannot bring us back again. I should be scared with infinite fright if I thought I must stay in the grave, if even the body was to stay in the grave. But Christ will come with glorious iconoclasm and split and grind up the rocks and let us all come forth. The Christ of the manger is the Christ of the throne.

CHRIST THE HEALER AND SYMPATHIZER.

THE BIBLE IN UGANDA.

THE country in the evangelization of which Bishop Hannington sacrificed his life and in which so much Christian blood has been shed must ever be a land of deep interest to Christians everywhere, for it has cost much. It is therefore very gratifying to learn from the Missionary Herald that there is an eager demand there for copies of the Word of God. It states that some boxes arrived in Uganda recently containing copies of the Gospels, and large wall reading-sheets. Notice was given that the books would be sold on the next day. The missionary, Mr. Baskerville, was aroused before day-break by the roar of voices and also to find his house in a state of siege. He barricaded the doors to keep the people outside, selling the books through the front window. But the barricades were useless; in came the door, and Mr. Baskerville says that there were 1,000 or more people, each with shells, "mad to buy a book." There were only three loads of books, whereas fifty could have been sold. Such eagerness to obtain portions of the Word of God is certainly a most hopeful sign. Captain Williams says that, in his own opinion and that of the missionaries, the "country is fast settling down, and that there is no serious disturbance to be anticipated."

Japan Drawing to Christ.

A Remarkable Conversion and its Far-Reaching Influence.

HIROSAKI, JAPAN, March 25.

DEAR EDITOR:—Kindly allow me to tender my heartiest thanks to the many kind friends who have helped me in my work by sending extra copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other papers, and also by their kind, generous contributions towards the "Noshiro" cause. The papers are greatly appreciated. The money sent through Brother Spencer has reached me safely and has been, in part, expended in the purchase of Bibles for the multitudes who hunger for the Bread of Life. The appeal which I made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 14th was so generally and generously responded to that I am very anxious to do something of a permanent nature for Noshiro. Brother Spencer returns to Japan in a month or so, and I have now thought it best to defer the prosecution of any definite plan for the establishment of the cause in Noshiro until he comes. Your correspondent is the only missionary in these two northern provinces (Aomori and Akita), and is 500 miles from Tokyo and nearly 200 miles from any other American.

Speaking of the progress of the work in Noshiro, will you allow me, please, to recite a brief instance which has recently transpired:

Two years ago, a young man from a country town twenty-five miles from here, came to this city as a student. Attracted by our services he came to church, joined one of our Bible classes, became greatly interested in the truths of Christianity, professed faith in Christ and requested baptism. Completing his studies, he returned to his home. His parents were Buddhists, of course, and so were all the family connections and friends. There was not a Christian in the town and never had been. For a long time he hesitated as to the best, wisest course to pursue. He prayed much and finally resolved not to openly profess his "new" religion but, to the very best of his ability, live its holy precepts in his daily life. After a short time he began to do some temperance work and through the establishment of a society, a score or more of young men pledged themselves against wine and tobacco which curse Japan as well as America. Finally such was the influence of his holy, earnest, blameless life, that his father asked him one day what it all meant. "Why are you living thus? Why do you work for temperance?" etc. The young fellow replied, "Father, I'm a Christian." The words were no sooner out of his mouth than he fully expected to see his father rise up in great anger and drive him from the home. But to his surprise the old gentleman dropped his head for a few moments in earnest thought, and then answered: "My boy, if this is Christianity, then I wish to be a Christian; please teach me." With tears for joy coursing down his cheeks, the son went to his room, got his little Testament and sat down at his father's side, and read him the story of the Gospel. The man was so deeply affected that he went to his old friend, the head man of the town (Mayor) and told him all about it, and the Mayor replied that he also would like to embrace the religion which had made such a change in the young man's life, for it must be a good thing. And so the young man had others to teach, until his father's house was full night after night with anxious inquirers.

The blessed Word of God had power and soon the tears of penitence and rejoicing began to flow and now I am called to go down to this town a week hence to baptize these happy people and receive them into the fellowship of the saints. Do you not envy the joy which shall surely be mine? I would'nt exchange my place as a worker for Christ in Japan with that of a king on a throne. The letter which invites me to the performance of this pleasant duty, requests me to place a pastor in their town next year, and they will build a church themselves and, in part at least, support the preacher. What hath God wrought? A year ago one soldier of the Cross in Numadate, to-day thirty or more. Bless his holy name forevermore! Yours "In His Name,"

FRUITS OF WISDOM.

S S. Lesson for May 14 Prov. 12: 1-15. Golden Text, Prov. 11: 30. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE fruit of the righteous is a tree of life; and he that winneth souls is wise." (Prov. 11: 30.) "I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and be thou a blessing" (Gen. 12: 2), was God's word to Abraham. It is the will of God that his children should be a blessing; separated, like the Levites of old, to "bless in his name." While an atmosphere of darkness and of death surrounds ungodly men, and all who come in contact with them are the sadder and the worse for their society, God would have his children, as being "the children of light and the children of the day," bring joy and sunshine, health and life with them wherever they go. The fruit of Jesus, the Righteous One, was indeed "a tree of life," and as surely as his children are sun clothed in his light, and their whole bodies full of light, they too become a tree of life; they bear "fruit unto life eternal"; and are wise to win souls. It is a solemn fact that we cannot be neutral in the matter of soul-winning; either we gather with Christ, or we scatter from him; either we, by life and word, draw men to Christ, or by our unreality and un-Christlikeness, our selfishness and indifference, we scatter them from him. Heavenly wisdom, i. e. Christ made unto us Wisdom, as he dwells in our hearts by faith, cannot but be fruitful in the winning of souls. A truly righteous man cannot live in vain.

In the passage before us we are to look for the fruits of wisdom, and they are not far to find. If "the righteous is a tree of life," the tree must have a root. "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." "But those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age." God's transplanting is out of ourselves into himself. Out of ourselves, our natural earthly soil, into himself "rooted and fixed in God," having the springs and sources of our life in him. Thus shall not be moved. God, in whom he has taken root, cannot be moved, his house is "built upon a rock," and "the gates of hell cannot prevail against it." It is the glory of God to show, as in Job's case, how much a righteous man may be put to the proof, and yet remain firmly rooted in his God. Such ground is no shifting sand, therefore, "the root of the righteous beareth fruit" like "the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind whose seed is in itself. The righteous thus reproduces himself and by his very contact with God makes other people like him. Because his root is right, "the thoughts of the righteous are right;" his inner life, "the hidden man of the heart in that which is not contemptible" is as right as his root and his fruit. A man with evil thoughts is sure to manifest sooner or later what is going on within. Whenever there is a lack of transparancy in the face of a child of God there is always something within to account for it. "The shew of their countenance doth witness against them." (Isa. 3: 9.)

And then again, the words of a righteous man are productive of good: "The mouth of the upright shall deliver them;" he shall be satisfied with the fruits of his mouth. "The tongue of the wise is health." He need not reproach himself for what he has spoken, and waste his time in vain regrets. If he has spoken what the Lord gave him to say, he cannot but have been himself blest in saying it, and a channel of blessing to others as well. What health there was in the tongue of Paul! How often we have known men and women who lived near to God, and whose words were unforgetable, for they were God given words. "If a man offend not in word the same is a perfect man and able also to bridle the whole body." In the lips of the Master "there was found no guile," and he could say: "The words which I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life." He wills that as he was, so should we be in the world, communicators of spirit and life by the God-given words we speak. And yet no man can rule or master his own tongue. "The tongue can no man tame;" it needs the hand of Almightiness, but before the tongue of the wise can be health, it needs to be conquered by God himself.

But what is it which produces a guarded or kept spirit and

A Guarded Tongue?

Attention to God. "He that hearkeneth unto counsel is wise." The man who was "wiser than all men" asked of God "a hearing heart." Solomon never wanted to be other than a learner, he says: "Whoso loveth instruction loveth knowledge;" it was Solomon's delight to learn. He puts into the mouth of wisdom the exhortation: "Hear instruction, and be wise, and refuse it not. Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors." Mary was ready to let the dinner be spoiled rather than fail to understand what the Lord Jesus wanted to teach her just at that moment. (Luke 10: 42.) She could run the risk of Martha's misunderstanding so that only all was well between her Saviour and her. A kept spirit and a kept tongue come from surrender to the Lord, trust in him, and then an uninterrupted watching and waiting upon him. And thus it comes that "the mouth of the upright shall deliver them;" a man shall be satisfied with good by the fruit of his mouth; that "he that speaketh truth sheweth forth righteousness; and the lips of truth shall be established for ever;" the elements of eternal life are in a God filled and God used tongue. And the man who possesses it is a happy man for "to the counsellors of peace is joy."

Then again it is not only in his thoughts and in his words that the righteous man is a tree of life, but

His Deeds Also

are fruitful. "In the way of righteousness there is life, and in the pathway thereof is no death," no real loss, and thus "there shall no evil happen to the just. All things work together for good to them that love God." Was it an evil which happened to Stephen when his enemies, mad with rage, hurled stone after stone at him till he was dead? An evil, when heaven stood open to him, and Jesus Christ visible to him, at the right hand of God, as he looked up to the place of his citizenship, with a face "as the face of an angel," and spent his last breath praying for his murderers? No; it was glory and triumph, and in his very death the martyr was "a tree of life." "The just shall come out of trouble." The same waters of the Flood which destroyed the ungodly bore Noah and his family upward nearer heaven. There is an exit Godward and heavenward, a safety valve on the heaven side, for every tired child of God who trusts in him. There can be no discouragement or despair in one who lives in immediate contact with God. Nothing is real loss to him, "the recompence of a man's hands shall be rendered to him," and the hand of the diligent Shall Bear Rule.

Joseph was a diligent learner of the Lord who was "with him," and irresistibly everything came under his control. He was but a slave, and yet he was the real master in the house of Potiphar. He was but a prisoner, and yet he was the real master in the prison; because God was with him he bore rule. Elijah was but a recluse by the brookside, but the very ravenous ravens must submit to give up their prey to him, because God who was with him willed it. He was but a friendless stranger in the widow's house, but she must consent to give up the last she had to feed him; and this by no tyranny, but because the Lord was with him, and she recognized it, and believed God.

David must "bear rule" in spite of his brothers' contemptuous depreciation of him. When Paul stood before kings and governors no authority made him to tremble: but the "rule" of the Spirit of God in him made his judges to tremble. And when the same man was carried to Rome by sea, this man, diligent in ascertaining the mind of his God, bore rule in the ship, and took the command of it when the captain was powerless. In the most impossible circumstances, God and those who trust him have the real command, and all others are but powerless, unconscious instruments, to work out his will.

Oh how in these last days, when we are looking for the coming of our Lord, important it is that we should be diligent in acquiring the knowledge of our God. Nothing else is worth living for, working for, suffering for, but to know him fully whom to know is life eternal. This was Paul's one aim, "That I may know him and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformed to his death, if that by any means I may attain to the resurrection (out from among) the dead." The kingliness of our calling, as kings and priests unto God, can never be realized but as we increase in the knowledge of God; this will bring forth the fruits of wisdom. "Wherefore, the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things ye shall never fall: for so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A SERIES of fifteen contrasts forms the subject of the lesson. The previous two chapters have been devoted to the consideration of social conditions. Even at the time they were written, the two classes of the rich and the poor were clearly defined, as well as were the causes which led to each condition. There is no attempt to minimize the advantages of wealth. It is frankly admitted that riches contribute in a very great degree to the comfort and happiness of life. Wealth is a man's strong city, it enables him to ransom himself, it brings him friends and influence and lifts him above temptations to wrong-doing which assail the poor. Since, then, wealth is desirable, the way to it is pointed out and stress is laid on industry, prudence, abstinence and integrity. Then, lest the young man should make the acquisition of money his chief business, there are several drawbacks mentioned. It is insecure, it may lead to arrogance and pride, it may be put to improper uses, and, at the best, it can only be useful in this life. There are other things which must not be overlooked in its pursuit. The man himself is to be developed. He must not be a fool and he is exhorted to watch the growth of his habits and propensities. The abundance of his life does not consist of the things he possesses. He must have riches in his mind, in his conscience and in an equable and benevolent disposition, as well as in his pocket. Then, follow rules of conduct which we are apt to regard as truisms, until we examine ourselves and see how little our lives are governed by them.

The thoughts of the righteous are right. It is important to have a high ideal. As water does not rise higher than its source, so conduct is not better than the principles of the heart. A man often does not live as his conscience tells him he ought to live, but if he maintains the standard of his conscience he will try to attain it and his conduct will become better by the effort. He should never lower his standard but try to bring his life up to it. The widow of Opie the great artist said: "During the nine years that I was his wife, I never saw him satisfied with one of his productions, and often, very often, I have seen him enter my sitting-room, and throwing himself in an agony of despondency on the sofa, exclaim, 'I never, never shall be a painter as long as I live.' It was a noble despair, such as is never felt by self-complacent daubers, and it bore the panting aspirant up to one of the highest niches in the artistic annals of his country. The self-same dissatisfaction with present attainments is a potent force to bear the Christian onward to a high degree of spirituality and holiness.

The house of the righteous shall stand. The righteous man is strong because God is on his side and can make all his enemies to be at peace with him. It is related of Eliot the famous apostle to the Indians in colonial days, that he heard that several Indian chiefs had become open enemies of the Gospel. Eliot was alone in the wilderness without the company of any white man, when several Indian chiefs came to his hut and threatened him. Eliot knew he was in their power, but his Almighty Protector inspired him with such resolution that he said, "I am about the work of the great God, and my God is with me, so that I fear neither you nor all the sachems in the country. I will go on and do you touch me if you dare." They heard him and shrank away.

A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast. He is not wrapped up in his own concerns. His own comfort and convenience are not the chief consideration to him. Everyone around him benefits by the righteousness in his heart and even the animals he possesses are happier than the animals of the selfish man, who might leave them to starve when they were no longer useful. George T. Angell relates that in Atri, one of the old cities of Italy, the king caused a bell to be hung in a tower in one of the public squares, and called it the "Bell of Justice," and commanded that any one who had been wronged should ring the bell, and so call the magistrate of the city and ask and receive justice. In the course of time the lower end of the bell-rope rotted away, and a wild vine was tied to it to lengthen it. One day an old and starving horse that had been abandoned by its owner and turned out to die, wandered into the tower and in trying to eat the vine rang the bell. The magistrate of the city, coming to see who had rung the bell, found this old and starving horse. And he caused the owner of the horse in whose service he had toiled and been worn out, to be summoned before him, and decreed that as this poor horse had rung the "Bell of Justice," he should have Justice, and that during the remainder of the horse's life his owner should provide for him.

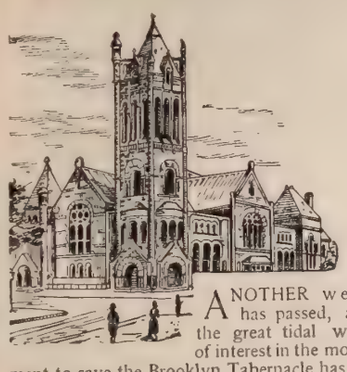
He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread. There is no royal road to wealth recommended in the proverbs. Again and again Solomon insists that the sure road is that of hard work. Dr. Dwight once said that he had never known more than one lazy man become a Christion and he became industrious after he became a Christian. Krummacher the famous German writer puts the results of industry and idleness in the form of a parable, thus: Saboth gave himself up to idleness. Hillel was grieved, and resolved to cure him of his fault. He took him to the valley of Hinnom, by Jerusalem, where was a standing pool full of snakes and vermin, and covered with muddy weeds. "Here," said Hillel, "let us rest." "Not here," said the youth. "Dost thou not perceive what poisonous vapors it exhales?" "Thou art right, my son, this bog is like the soul of a slothful man." Hillel then took the youth to a waste field, producing thorns and thistles. "This," said he, "has good soil to produce all that is good and pleasant, but it is neglected. A little while ago thou didst see the soul; now behold the life of an idle man." Saboth was so impressed that he began to lead a new life. Then Hillel took him to a fertile vale, by the side of a clear brook which flowed between fruitful trees. He said: "This is the picture of an industrious life. Nature, which warned thee, will now reward thee. Her beauty and grace can only give joy to him who sees in her life a picture of his own."

The doings of a man's hands shall be rendered unto him. (R. V.) A sad ending was that to the efforts which a man in Massachusetts made to injure his neighbor. They had quarrelled and the man resolved to poison his neighbor's dog. Arsenic was placed on some bread, and the latter was left where the dog was in the habit of prowling. But his own little daughter found the bread and ate a portion of it, and in a few hours died in great agony. The Bible warns us against all revengefulness. It is often the case, even in this world, that its results are far more disastrous to the one seeking to indulge this passion, than it is to the one on whom he seeks to exercise it.

The way of a fool is right in his own eyes. Charles Reade tells the story of the wreck of a noble ship through the perversity of its captain. As the ship was approaching port the sun set. A pilot offered his services but the captain had perfect confidence in his own skill and knowledge of the coast and declined the pilot's help. There were two passages into the harbor; one a dangerous narrow channel, the other a wide and safer one. The captain determined to pilot himself by the narrow passage. A storm was coming up, and the passengers, with fear and consternation, begged him to take the wider channel. He laughed at their cowardice, and swore he would do as he pleased. As the night advanced the gale increased. Soon arose a cry, "Breakers ahead! breakers ahead!" The captain flew to the wheel; the sails were struck; the wind had the mastery; and the captain found a will that could defy his own. The vessel made a fearful plunge, struck the foreship deep into the sand, to be shattered at the wild waves' pleasure.

LIKE AN ARMY OF RESCUE!

God's People Everywhere Pressing Forward to Save the Tabernacle—Offerings Pouring in from the New World and the Old—The Emergency Fund Nearly $22,000.



ANOTHER week has passed, and the great tidal wave of interest in the movement to save the Brooklyn Tabernacle has expanded in volume, until its extremities now touch both the New World and the Old. Never before have the Christian people of America been so deeply stirred as by this effort to rescue from impending desecration the great Temple of the Gospel of Jesus Christ which has become dear through its associations to his followers in many lands and especially in our own. For the Brooklyn Tabernacle has been, for many years, a centre of evangelism, a Christian Mecca, toward which the eyes and hearts of innumerable multitudes have turned with unfailing regularity, and from which they have drawn spiritual refreshment and encouragement. The Tabernacle has literally kept "open house" to worshippers from every State in the Union, as no other church has ever done. More visitors annually come to New York than any other city on this continent, and a very large proportion of them invariably come to the Tabernacle. Of a thousand persons who visit Chicago or any other large American city, the church-goers may be found distributed among a score of different houses of worship; but of a thousand who come to New York, it is safe to venture the assertion that half the number go to the Tabernacle.

The Emergency Fund is now nearly $22,000 and is steadily growing, affording encouragement to hope that the object may soon be accomplished and the debt that now threatens the future of the Tabernacle extinguished. Unless this is actually achieved, every dollar of the Fund, subscribed through "The Christian Herald" will be restored to the senders.

"A Friend," who will not permit his name to be published, has subscribed to the Fund the sum of $5,000. Friends and sympathizers in England have forwarded $625. The great volume of offerings, however, is from the domestic field, where they range from the modest dime of the humble worker to the ten dollar check of the well-to-do. A few have given with exceptional generosity, one lady in New Jersey forwarding her check for $500, while a large number of others sent amounts ranging from $5 to $20.

The contributions during the week have been as follows:

SUMMER PERILS.

THE first temptation that is apt to hover in this direction, in the coming summer, is to leave your piety all at home. You will send the dog and cat and canary-bird to be well cared for somewhere else; but the temptation will be to leave your religion in the room with the blinds down and the door bolted, and then you will come back in the autumn to find that it is starved and suffocated, lying stretched on the rug, stark dead. There is no surplus of piety at the watering-places. I never knew any one to grow very rapidly in grace at the popular summer-resorts. It is generally the case that the Sabbath is more of a carousal than any other day, and there are Sunday walks, and Sunday rides, and Sunday excursions.

Elders, and deacons, and ministers of religion who are entirely consistent at home, sometimes when the Sabbath dawns on them at Niagara Falls or the White Mountains, take the day to themselves. If they go to church, it is apt to be a sacred parade, and the discourse, instead of being a plain talk about the soul, is apt to be what is called a crack sermon—that is, some discourse picked out of the effusions of the year as the one most adapted to excite admiration; and in those churches, from the way the ladies hold their fans, you know that they are not so much impressed with the heat as with the picturesqueness of half-disclosed features. Four puny souls stand in the organ-loft and squall a tune that nobody knows, and worshipers, with two thousand dollars' worth of diamonds on the right hand, drop a cent into the poor-box, and then the benediction is pronounced and the farce is ended.

The toughest thing I ever tried to do was to be good at a watering-place. The air is bewitched with "the world, the flesh, and the devil." There are Christians who in three or four weeks in such a place, have had such terrible rents made in their Christian robe that they had to keep darning it until Christmas to get it mended! The health of a great many people makes an annual visit to some mineral spring an absolute necessity; but, my dear people, take your Bible along with you, and take an hour for secret prayer every day, though you be surrounded by guffaw and saturnalia. Keep holy the Sabbath, though they desecrate [illegible] Stand off from those institutions which propose to imitate on this side the water the iniquities of Baden-Baden. Let your moral and your immortal health keep pace with your physical recuperation, and remember that all the waters of Hathorne and sulphur and chalybeate springs can not do you so much good as the mineral, healing, perennial flood that breaks forth from the "Rock of Ages." This may be your last summer. If so, make it a fit vestibule of heaven.

SOUL SAVING STATIONS.

NEAR my summer residence there is a life-saving station on the beach. There are all the ropes and rockets, the boats, the machinery, for getting people off shipwrecks. A few summers ago I saw there fifteen or twenty men who were breakfasting, after having just escaped with their lives and nothing more. Up and down our coasts are built these useful structures, and the mariners know it, and they feel that if they are driven into the breakers there will be apt from shore to come a rescue. The churches of God ought to be so many soul-saving stations, not so much to help those who are in smooth waters as those who have been shipwrecked. Come, let us run out the life-boats! And who will man them?

I would rather, in a mud-scow, try to weather the worst cyclone that ever swept up from the Caribbean, than risk my immortal soul in useless and perilous discussions. They remind me of a company of sailors standing on Ramsgate pier-head, from which the life-boats are usually launched, and coolly discussing the different style of oar-locks, and how deep a boat ought to set in the water, while a hurricane is in full blast, and there are three steamers crowded with passengers going to pieces in the offing.

An old tar, the muscles of his face working with nervous excitement, cries out, "This is no time to discuss such things. Man the lifeboat! Who will volunteer? Out with her into the surf! Pull, my lads, pull for the wreck! Ha! ha! Now we have them. Let them in, and lay them down on the bottom of the boat. Jack, you try to bring them to. Put these flannels around their hands and feet, and I will pull for the shore. God help me! There! Landed! Huzza!" When there are so many struggling in the waves of sin, and sorrow, and wretchedness, let all else go but salvation for time and salvation forever.

HUMBLE HEROISM.

THE impression is abroad that the Christian rewards are for those who do conspicuous service in distinguished places—great martyrs, great patriots, great preachers, great philanthropists. But there is just as much reward for a man that stays at home and minds his own business, and who, crippled and unable to go forth and lead in great movements and in the high places of the earth, does his whole duty just where he is. Garrison duty as important and as remunerative as service at the front.

There are women who say, "If I had as brilliant a sphere as those people had, I should be as brave and as grand; but my business is to get the children off to school and to hunt up things when they are lost, and to see that dinner is ready and to keep account of the household expenses and to hinder the children from being strangulated by the whooping cough, and to go through all the annoyances and vexations of housekeeping. Oh, my sphere is so infinitesimal, and so insignificant, I am clear discouraged." Woman, God places you on garrison duty, and your reward will be just as great as that of Florence Nightingale, who, moving so often night by night with a light in her hand through the hospitals, was called by the wounded the "lady of the lamp." Your reward will be just as great as that of Mrs. Hertzog, who built and endowed theological seminary buildings. Your reward will be just as great as that of Hannah More, who by her excellent books won for her admirers Garrick, and Edmund Burke, and Joshua Reynolds. Rewards are not to be given according to the amount of noise you make in the world, nor even according to the amount of good you do, but according to whether you work to your full capacity, according to whether or not you do your full duty in the sphere where God has placed you.

A Christian woman was seen going along the edge of a wood every eventide, and the neighbors in the country did not understand how a mother with so many cares and anxieties should waste so much time as to be idly sauntering out evening by evening. It was found out afterward that she went there to pray for her household, and while there one evening she wrote that beautiful hymn, famous in all ages for cheering Christian hearts:

I love to steal a while away
From every cumbering care,
And spend the hours of setting day
In humble, grateful prayer.

Shall there be no reward for such unpretending yet everlasting service?

BELIEF IN SPOTS.

"WHERE shall I go?" said a dying Hindoo to a Brahmitic priest to whom he had given money to pray for his salvation. "Where shall I go after I die?" The Brahmitic priest said: "You will go first of all into a holy quadruped." "But," said the dying Hindoo, "where shall I go then?" "Then you shall go into a singing bird." "But," said the dying Hindoo, "where then shall I go?" "Then," said the Brahmitic priest, "you will go into a beautiful flower." The dying Hindoo threw up his arms in an agony of solicitation as he said: "But where shall I go last of all?" Thank God this Bible tells the Hindoo, tells you, tells me, not where I shall go to-day, not where I shall go to-morrow, not where I shall go next year, but where I shall go last of all!

"Ask for the old paths, walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." But follow the crusade against any part of the Bible, and first of all you will give up Genesis, which is as true as Matthew; then you will give up all the historical parts of the Bible; then after a while, you will give up the miracles; then you will find it convenient to give up the Ten Commandments; and then after a while you will wake up in a fountainless, rockless, treeless desert swept by everlasting sirocco. I am in full sympathy with the advancements of our time, but this world will never advance a single inch beyond this old Bible. God was just as capable of dictating the truth to the prophets and apostles as he is capable of dictating the truth to these modern apostles and prophets. God has not learned anything in a thousand years. He knew just as much when he gave the first diction as the last diction. So I will stick to the old paths. Naturally a sceptic, and preferring new things to old, I never so much as now felt the truth of the entire Bible, especially as I see into what spectacular imbecility men rush when they try to chop up the Scriptures with the meat-axe of their own preferences, now calling upon philosophy, now calling on the Church, now calling on God, now calling on the devil. I prefer the thick, warm robe of the old religion—old as God—the robe which has kept so many warm amid the chills of death. The old robe rather than the thin, uncertain gauze offered by these wiseacres who believe the Bible in spots.

HAYDN was right when he waved his hand toward heaven and said, "It comes from there." Music was born in heaven, and it will ever have its highest throne in heaven; and I want you to understand that our departed friends who were passionately fond of music here are now at the headquarters of harmony. I think that the grand old church tunes that died when our grandfathers died have gone with them to heaven.

YATMAN'S COLUMN.

SUPERFICIAL WORK.

LISTEN! Don't do superficial work in any department of Christ's kingdom. Go in to be thorough and deep. This shallow surface work has already wrought much harm. So many think noise and numbers count above all else. Not so. Gideon's army of three hundred was worth more by far to the service of Israel and God than his thirty-two thousand. I can name you to-day, in a dozen churches, not far distant, individuals who are worth more to Zion and heaven, than all the folk who walk up the middle aisle put together. What they do, they do well; and for lasting service, which will tell for the kingdom of Christ, they are worth more than their weight in gold.

I wonder, dear reader, if you count on that side.

Maybe not. It's good to be frank and honest. Seek the smaller and better crowd.

To Men in Trouble.

Listen, men! The devil has a thousand snares to entrap you, and some of his steel traps are saw-toothed, and what is worse I'm writing to some who have been caught.

I want to name a number of these "Traps."

No. 1. "The Money Trap"—stealing! began by taking a little. Now it's larger amounts and how to get out of the thing you don't know. Let me tell you: ask God to help you, and quit; quit this minute for quitting begins in the heart. Then make restitution, cost what it may, straighten things out. Isaiah 42: 16 was written for just such cases and it's now your time to put both God and yourself to the test.

No. 2. "The Swearing Trap," caught in this foul-mouthed thing. Its loathsome breath is worse than a skunk. It is bad enough to be caught by the hand like in trap No. 1, but to be caught by the tongue, this is ten times worse. The remedy is as above.

No. 3. "The Drinking Trap," caught by the throat. Death by strangulation. Hell to follow. Mighty few escape when once caught. Now and then one, but here the powers of the pit get their game and as a rule they skin them alive.

No. 4. "The Licentious Trap," caught by the strange woman, ensnared by passion, gilded vice, but sharper teeth here than any of the above. Caught, maybe, unawares. In seeking to escape there has been more torture than martyrs endured. Suffering now perhaps the woe of the damned. Like a bird in the net, there seems nothing ahead but agony. Perhaps besides the agony, hush money has been going out, and the awful fear of discovery and the conscious knowledge that no help can be expected from the source whence help should come. I mean human help. No recognition of human weakness. No willingness to forgive. No remembrance of vows to stand "for better or for worse." "What shall I do?" is your cry. I will tell you. First of all go straight to Jesus. He knows all our infirmities. He was born of woman. He can and will help you to be pure. He will wash away all guilt and sin in his own blood. Then read Psalms 51 and 32; then Isaiah 41: 10, then pray. Pray like Jacob prayed. Pray till three things are yours. First, God's known favor and forgiveness. Second, divine strength assisting you, purpose never to break the seventh commandment again. Third, courage to confess and seek human help where it should be found, and believe me, the unexpected will happen, the supernatural will assist, the release and peace that comes from bondage broken will be yours, and after all this—keep in the King's highway where people live who know the meaning of Psalm 18.

Your Next Service.

Remember this: every preaching service is set apart by God for some one's salvation and who knows but what next time you enter the house of the Lord some soul may fix its eternal destiny. Do your best to get them to bow before the cross, to humble themselves in the sight of God against whom they have sinned, to receive Jesus as their Lord and Master. Be careful of your methods that by them you do not hinder, but help the sinner. Don't be afraid to give an invitation which is frank, open and plain, be bold, and with it mingle the spirit of love and prayer. Above all, don't side with the sinner and against God that some future time will do for repentance and salvation. Let it ring out in clear and unmistakable tones: "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Popular Victory in Belgium.

A MORE decisive popular victory than that gained in Belgium by the people over their rulers, has seldom been achieved. By sheer numbers and the demonstration of the popular will, the Legislature was compelled to reverse a decision which it had previously passed by a vote of four to one. The question involved was an extension of the franchise. The workingmen of the country demanded the right to vote at the election of legislators. Hitherto the wealthy classes alone have had the vote. The consequence has been that the legislators have faithfully served the class which elected them and neglected the interests of the poor. The condition of the workingman in Belgium was therefore fast degenerating into one little better than slavery. He is without the protection of those laws which, in other lands, in some slight degree restrain the power and rapacity of oppressive employers. The people had come to despair of ever getting such laws unless they could share in the privilege of electing the men who make the laws. When, therefore, the Legislature rejected the bill recently introduced to confer that right, there was great indignation. The labor leaders ordered a general strike, that the men might give expression to the national will. The order was extensively obeyed. At Verviers alone, forty-five factories were closed, and in the province of Hainut fifteen mines and two factories were deserted, and the men thus liberated to the number of 15,000 joined in the ranks of the crowd who were demanding political recognition. The police and eventually the military were employed against them, but were resisted fiercely. In Antwerp the men quitted the docks, where they were employed in loading the vessels, raised barricades in the streets and fought desperately with the soldiers. They secured firearms after a few hours and many of the police and soldiery fell in attempting to disperse them. Similar scenes were witnessed in Mons, Liege and other large towns, besides the great demonstration in Brussels itself. The movement grew more threatening from day to day, until it approached the proportions of a revolution. Then the Legislature yielded. On April 18 it passed the bill extending the franchise, by a vote of 119 to 12. The men were satisfied and promptly returned to work and the streets resumed their normal appearance. There is reason for thankfulness that revolution was averted. The people were in the mood in which excesses, far more terrible than those that were committed, are done. The legislators were evidently terrified by what they saw, and yielded lest worse things might come upon them. It would have been better for them and for the couutry had they yielded earlier. They evidently thought that it was safe to resist people who had no legitimate means of holding them to account. It is never safe to have that opinion and act upon it, for even if the people do not rise, the Bible declares that "when there is a violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province One that is higher than the highest regardeth it." (Eccles. 5: 8.)

Innocuous Medicines.

In the course of an interview with a popular physician in New York, published last week, a disclosure was made which will surprise many patients. The physician said that he was frequently consulted by persons for whom it would be imprudent to prescribe the remedy which would most surely effect a cure. They are hypochondriacs, who having nothing to do and nothing to think about but themselves, imagine that there is something wrong with their hearts, or their livers, or some other part of their system. The best thing to cure them would be hard work or some absorbing study. They suffer as a rule from neither organic nor functional disease, but only from imagination, which would be less active or better employed if they were engaged in practical work for themselves or others. They would be offended with the physician if he treated them on that principle and would apply to another doctor. He therefore gives them pills made of bread or sugar, disguised by some nauseous, but innocuous drug, and leads them to believe that they are on the way to recovery. Ministers and Christian workers are also troubled by this class of people who are perplexed about the unpardonable sin, or some abstruse doctrine, or apparent discrepancy in Biblical history. In their case, however, there is no need of resorting to the physician's artifice, as there is divine warrant for the prescription of work. He that doeth the Lord's will shall know of the doctrine. (John 7 : 17.)

A Cruel Swindler.

A successful imposition on a widow in Hungary is described in a despatch to a New York journal. The woman lives at a small village named Bezdon, where every one knows his neighbor's business. Her husband had been an industrious, thrifty man and he left her all his savings, amounting to about four hundred dollars. A few days after his death, the widow received a mysterious visitor. He came in the dead of night, after she had retired to rest, and he had some difficulty in inducing her to rise and dress and admit him. Eventually, he succeeded, and then he told her that he was the bearer of a communication from her late husband. In fact, he said, he was the Apostle Peter, who had the keys of heaven. Her husband had presented himself there, but had been refused admittance on account of his having during his lifetime neglected to contribute to the charities of the Church. Nothing less than the sacrifice of all his savings would purge him of this sin and he trusted that his widow would consent to the sacrifice. The poor woman was too much agitated by the appearance of her visitor, who had a long beard and wore a loose flowing robe, to exercise her ordinary good sense. She was also much distressed by the report of her dead husband's condition and she finally handed to her visitor the four hundred dollars, which was all she had in the world. The police are searching for the impostor, but so far without success. It is a pity that the woman was not better instructed, but her ignorance is not without parallel. There are many, even among people who should know better, who seem to think that money given to Christ's cause will secure for them admission to heaven, in spite of inconsistency of life. (1. Cor. 13: 3.)

An Arctic Exploring Party.

An expedition to the Arctic is now being arranged which has a different object from that usually sought by Arctic explorers. It is that of finding the magnetic pole to which the needle of the mariner's compass points. The Government Coast and Geodetic Survey Department has offered to supply the necessary instruments and early in the summer Col. W. H. Gilder and a corps of trained, scientific observers will set out on the expedition, to devote three years to a careful study of the problem. It has long been known that the North Pole and the magnetic pole are not identical. The pole to which the needle points is believed to be twelve hundred miles south of the North Pole, and it appears to vary in location. During the last sixty years it appears to have moved to a point about a hundred miles west of the one it occupied in 1831. The movement may be only apparent, as some scientific men contend, or it may be real. This question the expedition hopes to determine. The results of the observation will be of the highest practical value. If the needle on which the mariner relies in guiding his course across the trackless deep, points to a variable centre, he may be misled, and it is of the utmost importance that he should know the law of variation in order that he may allow for it in his observations. Happily for the world, there can arise no doubt as to the Christian's course. We are assured that it is toward him who is "the same yesterday, to-day and forever." (Heb. 13: 7,8.)

An Extraordinary Fence.

The erection of the longest fence in the world is shortly to be commenced in South Dakota. A dispatch from Chamberlain in that State, says that the stockmen on the borders of the Indian reservation have held a meeting to consider an offer from the United States Government, which has been presented by the agent at Pine Ridge. It is for the fencing in of the western and northern sides of the Reservation to prevent the straying of cattle, which has been a fruitful source of trouble with the Indians. The Government proposes to furnish wire and posts, if the stockmen will erect a durable four wire fence. The stockmen accepted the offer and the erection is to be commenced as soon as the material arrives. The fence will be ninety miles long. There are tens of thousands of cattle in that section and in spite of the vigilance of the stockmen large numbers of them every year stray on the Indian lands, where they are captured as estrays by the Indians. There is then a dispute between them and the stockmen as to the ownership, or as to the sum to be paid for their surrender. These disputes always lead to ill-feeling and not infrequently to bloodshed. The building of the fence will, it is hoped, put an end to the trouble, by removing the cause. When professing Christians are seen in the theatre, on the race-course and in other places which belong to the world, rather than the church, one is apt to wish that some such device could be brought into operation to prevent human estrays. But God has never treated men as beasts are treated. He would have them love him so well that they have no disposition to wander. (Psalm 32: 9.)

The Belgian Franchise Riots. Scene in the City of Antwerp.

A Choice of Thermometers.

In illustration of a point he was making in a recent speech, Mr. Chauncey M. Depew related an incident, which occurred while he was at Old Point Comfort. It was necessary, Mr. Depew said, in view of the critical condition of his wife's health, that her room should be kept at a uniform temperature. He therefore went to the store to purchase a thermometer. The store-keeper brought six from his stock and submitted them to Mr. Depew for his choice. He looked at them closely and noticed that no two of them agreed as to the temperature, and between the highest and the lowest, there was a difference of ten degrees. He called the store-keeper's attention to the difference and remarked that they were useless for his purpose, as he should not know from them whether he ought to light a fire in the room, or open the window. The store-keeper had no solution to offer, but suggested that his customer take them all over to his place and try them, and keep the one that suited him best. Probably Mr. Depew would have accepted the suggestion if he had wanted the thermometer for an ornament. As, however, he needed it to register the temperature with absolute accuracy, these varying instruments were of no use to him. The store-keeper's idea, however, is not an uncommon one in spiritual matters. People go in the greatest numbers to hear the preacher whose sermons suit them best, rather than to hear him who is concerned to preach only the absolute truth without fear or favor. (II. Tim. 4: 3.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Protestant Episcopal Church of Newport, R. I., is to receive a church, to cost $100,000, from Mrs. Sarah Jackson, of New York, in memory of her mother, the late Mrs. Andrew C. Zabriskie.

The London Missionary Society recently asked its supporters to adopt "the self-denial week" plan, inaugurated by the Salvation Army. The result was the addition of $35,000 to the Society's treasury.

The following contributions have been received for the Zambesia Mission, described in these columns on April 5: George W. Bugh, $1; A friend, $5; A "Shut-in," $1. Mr. and Mrs. Richards sailed from New York for Zambesia on April 22.

The proportion of missionaries to population in several countries is given as follows in a recent publication: In India there is one missionary to every 275,000 persons; in Persia one to 300,000; in Thibet one to 2,000,000; in Afghanistan no missionary, though there is a population of six millions.

Father Chiniquy, the valiant upholder of Protestantism, who has done so much to expose the errors and crimes of the Roman Catholic Church, in which he was once a priest, has received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the Presbyterian College at Montreal, at its recent convocation. He is eighty-two years old.

Bishop Potter, of New York, has issued a letter to the clergy of his diocese expressing the hope that they will adopt the revised edition of the Book of Common Prayer immediately. The work of revising the book has occupied thirteen years, and has been carefully done. Some of the changes are radical.

Persons desiring to send money to aid the work of the shelter established in Mulberry St., New York, by Miss Louise Beiser and Jessie De Vie, which was described in this journal on April 12, should address it to Mr. J. L. Spicer of the American Sunday School Union, Bible House, New York, who has charge of the finances of the shelter.

A meeting of the International Evangelistic Association was held on April 25 in the Fourth Ave. Presbyterian Church, New York. Mr. John E. Gray who has been Secretary of the English Branch of the Association for six years past attended and described the work in that country. Dr. R. S. MacArthur, Rev. John R. Davies, Dr. M. D. Kneeland of Boston, Donald McColl of Princeton, and other eminent ministers were present and expressed their interest in the work.

The American Sunday School Union celebrated its sixty-ninth anniversary on Sunday, April 30, by a meeting in the Fifth Ave. Baptist Church, New York. Dr. Faunce and Dr. Behrends were the chief speakers. The Union showed by its reports that it never was in greater health and vigor, although it has attained the age of nearly three score and ten years. Its operations are extending every year and our readers have the gratification of knowing that one of its most valued workers, Rev. G. W. Sharp is supported by them.

Prof. H. B. Hartzler of Northfield Seminary, writes us that Mr. Moody has made arrangements for the International Conferences this year as follows: The Young Women's Conference, June 20–28; The World's Student Conference, July 1–9; Christian Workers, Aug. 1–13. Mr. Moody will preside on each occasion. He hopes that the Young Women's Conference, which is a new feature, will be to college young women such a help as the Student Conference has proved to young men. All inquiries should be addressed to Prof. H. B. Hartzler, East Northfield, Mass.

The Berachah Mission in New York has issued its ninth annual report. We have already published pictures of this mission and have frequently referred to the excellent work being done there among the sailors who visit the port, and the slaves of vice who are numerous in and around "Hell's Kitchen" where the mission is located. The past year has been an unusually busy and successful one. Mrs. Henry Naylor who, with her late husband, built the mission and has supported it hitherto, would now gladly receive aid in carrying it on, as its philanthropic department has so greatly extended. Contributions may be sent to her at Berachah Mission, 463 W. 32 St., New York.

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

GROWTH IN GRACE AND KNOWLEDGE.

A Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, last Sunday, April 30, 1893, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D. D. Text: "But grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." II. Peter 3: 18.

ROM the discussion in the chapter from which the text is taken, it is certain that the apostle feared that there was danger lest believers should be drawn away from the simplicity of their faith and from the constancy of their obedience. In order that they might be fortified against these dangers he earnestly exhorts them to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. This thought occupies a prominent place in the apostle's teaching. He deemed it of so much importance that he gives it great prominence in the closing words of this last epistle. If anything were needed to give emphasis to these words the place which they here occupy would secure for them the needed attention and the necessary emphasis. No truth is more frequently taught in the Word of God than that the life of a Christian is to be

A Continuous Growth.

As born of God, he is a little child; he then passes on to the period of youth, and finally reaches the condition of full stature in the Lord. On the subject of growth we need line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a great deal. It thus becomes necessary constantly to repeat this closing exhortation of this epistle of the apostle Peter. Religion is here spoken of as consisting in grace and knowledge. It is not uncommon to represent religion by a single word or by several words. Sometimes it is represented by faith, sometimes by love, sometimes by hope, sometimes by peace, or by some other equally significant word. It is here represented as consisting in growth in Christian grace and knowledge. To know Christ aright is to know the very heart of Christian truth, and to make progress in Christian experience. The ripest Christian knows yet but little of the Lord Jesus Christ. The more we know the more we feel our ignorance, and the greater is our desire for fuller knowledge. Even the apostle Paul needed to know God more fully, for much as he knew he realized that there was vastly more yet to be learned.

No angel in heaven has yet exhausted the knowledge which God can impart, and the glories which his character suggests and illustrates. Right views of his person, his character, and his work are the sum and essence, the heart and crown, of the Christian religion.

Complete Knowledge of Jesus Christ possesses all that is really essential to his welfare in time, and to his blessedness in eternity. Whatever a man may know of the learning of earthly schools, if he be ignorant of Jesus Christ he is ignorant indeed. Though he may be profoundly skilled in all science, if he knows not the science of salvation he is pitifully blind and ignorant. He may know all other characters of history, but if he knows not Jesus Christ he has never known true excellence in character, greatness in intellect, purity in heart, and divinity in humanity. The school of Christ is the noblest of all universities. The man who sits in the lowliest place at Jesus's feet is the man best prepared steadily to walk in the dizziest heights of human learning. Only the graduate of Christ's school on earth can be a matriculate in the celestial university where saints and seraphs may be his fellow students. The man who knows not the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ is without the knowledge which pertains to his highest development on earth and to his full blessedness in eternity.

But even if we have come to know Christ as our personal Saviour and have some adequate conception of the knowledge which he imparts, growth is still our privilege and duty. When we are exhorted to grow in grace, the exhortation is equivalent to a command to increase in all that constitutes true religion and in the perfect development of Christian character. The entire Bible is full of exhortations similar in purport.

Growth is a Proof of Life.

The presence of inward spiritual life implies and secures growth in outward Christian acts. Dead trees do not grow; living trees must grow or soon cease to be living trees. If in this glorious spring time there be plants and trees which give no evidence of growth we are warranted in affirming that they are not possessed of life. In the vast laboratory of God marvelous forces making for growth are now at work in blade and plant and tree. Soon the living trees in our parks will be beautiful in the blossoms of spring and in the verdant garments of summer. But if amid this wonderful array of living forces there are trees which show no signs of life, we are warranted in affirming that they are dead. Blossom, leaf and flower are the certain outcome of life in root and branch. When trees thus reveal their inner life, can we not predicate the existence of that life? In the parable of the sower we learn that the seed is sown, and that it springs up in various places, but in many cases dies away. Only in one case is there true life, and this life is shown by the fruit which the plant bears. The godly man is compared to a tree that "bringeth forth its fruit in its season." He is also likened to the tree that "spreadeth out her roots by the river, neither shall cease from yielding fruit." It is also affirmed that he shall flourish like the palm tree, that he shall grow as a cedar in Lebanon, that he shall be as the lily and grow as the vine. If we do not find in this way, we are sure that they possess but a weak and sickly life, if they have life at all. Those who do not grow in grace soon die. No man can live upon past grace. No political party can live upon its past achievements, however patriotic and renowned. No religious denomination can long live upon its dead heroes and saints, however illustrious they may have been in their lives and however glorious in their attainments. Political parties, religious denominations and individual Christians must bring forth fruit now, must recognize present obligations and must achieve present victories. Failing in these respects, they will live a sickly life or die a speedy death. As well might a man expect to support his body on yesterday's food as to nourish his soul on yesterday's grace. No man ought to look back at the time of his conversion for the proofs of that conversion. A growing Christian finds the evidence of his Christianity in his present attainments, and in his brightening aspirations. The man who is obliged to look back through several years to the time of his conversion for the proof of its reality has reason to fear that he never was converted.

Christians Growing

The figure of a race, which is so often found in the Word of God, teaches the duty, the possibility, and

The Method of Progress.

The apostle Paul teaches us not to rest satisfied with present attainments. He had run long and well, still he says, not as though I had already attained, neither were already perfect. He pressed forward constantly toward the mark of the prize. He daily forgot the things that were behind, forgot his triumphs, forgot his failures, and reached forth unto the things that were before. His was constantly an upward calling, high to-day, it was to be higher to-morrow, and still higher the day after. We are elsewhere taught that the path of the just is a light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

Growth in religion is as natural as in any other faculty of the soul. Often its beginnings are very feeble; our Lord anticipated this truth and gave encouragement in such a case. He likens faith to a grain of mustard seed, which is the smallest of all seeds. But if the faith be genuine, it will grow as did the mustard seed, which finally became a tree with birds lodging in its branches. At the first faith may be like a blade of grass, then the ear, and after that the full corn in the ear. Religion is as susceptible of growth as any other faculty of the mind or virtue of the heart. All professors of religion who have become eminent for piety developed their religious faculties as the result of a definite purpose and by the use of appropriate means. No Christian ever becomes distinguished for faith, zeal and consecration as the result of accident. As well might a man expect to become eminent for learning without earnest study, as to expect to grow in divine grace and knowledge without putting forth the necessary effort and using the divinely-appointed means. Men have no more religion than they determine to have. If they want but little they shall have but little. If they are willing to pay the price in self-abnegation and self-consecration, in giving up all they have and are to the service of God and man, they shall have piety in the most eminent degree. No men become Bunyans and Baxters, Wesleys and Whitefields, Spurgeons and Moodys except they give themselves up body and soul to the service of God. "Men may rise on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things; but we must die to self if we are thus to rise and are truly to live to God.

Half-hearted Christians know nothing of the living power, the actual joy and possible bliss of Christians who lay themselves as living sacrifices on the altar of Jesus Christ. Let us remember that the Christian life is governed by laws as universal and uniform as gravitation and as eternal as God. If Christians conform their lives to these irresistible laws they will grow in stature; but if they do not, they will become pitiful dwarfs in the Christian life. No more painful is the physical dwarf in the midst of laughing, romping, growing, and joyous children than is the truncated Christian among stalwart men and beautiful women in the church and army of the Lord. A Christian ought never to sing, and a growing Christian will never sing:

> Where is the blessedness I knew
> When first I saw the Lord?
> Where is the soul-refreshing view
> Of Jesus and his word?

Parts of the hymn from which these lines are taken are exquisitely beautiful and entirely appropriate as the prayer of a growing Christian, but the plaintive cry uttered in these words will never be heard from the lips of a believer who is advancing in divine grace and knowledge. It is quite true that often in conversion the sudden transformation from the darkness of midnight to the brightness of noonday may so emphasize conversion that in after years a believer will look back with thanksgiving and longing to that period; the most progressive Christian will look back with great joy to his entrance upon the Christian life, but after years of Christian service he knows that he is far in advance in grace and knowledge, in joy and peace, in consecration and anticipation of what he was at the time of his initiation into the Christian life. The scarred veteran is better than the new recruit. The man who catches inspiration from the cannon's deep roar is better than he who trembles at the rifle's sharp music. Paul saying, "I have a desire to depart and to be with Christ," is a far greater man than Paul asking, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

School or Hospital?

Too many church members are sulking in their tents instead of working or fighting in the field. Too many think the church is an ambulance to bear them to some spiritual retreat. Too many think the church is a hospital for the wounded rather than a school for learners, a vineyard for workers, and a battle field for fighters. We are matriculated into the church as babes desiring the sincere milk of the Word; we grow as strong men and women upon the strong meat of the Word, and we are graduated that we may partake of angels' food in heaven. Growth and progress must be seen at every stage. I repeat, men have just as much religion as they desire to have; if they are satisfied with leanness they shall be lean, but if they hunger and thirst after righteousness they shall be filled. I can have no sympathy with men and women whose aim is to get something of heaven hereafter, and do as little as possible of God's will here and now. The true Christian never asks, is this or that duty or grace necessary to salvation? The man who strives to do as little as possible, and to possess only such Christian graces as will not interfere with his worldly enjoyment, is guilty of the very climax of folly and meanness. The man who is determined to have only as much religion as will admit him to heaven is not likely to get nearer heaven than he is in his half-hearted Christian life upon the earth.

What is heaven? To be like Jesus. Where is heaven? To be with Jesus. Every man has heaven here and now in proportion as he is like and with Jesus Christ. Heaven and hell hereafter are but of life on earth. The man who loves God cannot be kept out of heaven; he has heaven wherever he goes; the man who hates God cannot be kept out of hell, he has hell in himself. Heaven and hell are conditions as truly as they are places. No arbitrary allotment of God assigns men to heaven or to hell. They are the fruitage of the characters possessed during our earthly lives. No man will enter heaven at the last except heaven enters him here. No man can be kept out of hell at the last except hell is gotten out of him here. There is tremendous solemnity in these great laws which sweep through the universe of God.

The differences which we see in Christian attainment are caused by the differences in the efforts made to make attainments in the Christian life. Our growth here will determine our standing hereafter. There are degrees in glory as truly as in punishment. No more certain is it that one star differeth from another star in glory, than that one man shall differ from another man in the resurrection of the dead. All who are Christians are saved by the precious blood of Christ alone; but great differences will be seen among the saved. Some are brought into the kingdom at the eleventh hour, plucked as brands from the burning; they are saved, yet so as by fire. There are others to whom an abundant entrance will be given, to whom the gates of glory will swing wide open; there are those who will enter with shining train of the redeemed amid welcoming songs of saints and seraphs. Paul's heaven is very different from the heaven of the robber crucified with Jesus. All in heaven will be blessed, but the capacity for receiving blessing will differ greatly and will depend upon the spiritual development on earth. Some Christians are willing to remain babes in Christ; others earnestly strive to become Perfect Men in Christ.

Growth depends upon the use of appropriate means. There must first be spiritual life. No amount of tillage will cause a post which has been planted in the ground to grow as a tree. Culture may develop plants but never posts. Christ is the true source of life. No branch can bear fruit except it receive this life-giving sap from Christ, the living vine. There must be a foundation before a building can rise. There must be a candle and it must be lighted before it can give light to all that are in the house. Growth implies and necessitates the existence of life: and there must be advancement or retrogression. A Christian is like a man on a bicycle, he must go on or soon go off. There can be no standing still for any length of time in the Christian race. The Christian race is either climbing or falling; it is either going up or down.

Among the means absolutely necessary to growth is the constant study of the Word of God. Here are to be found the sincere milk for the young Christian and the strong meat for the mature believer. Here is found the bread of heaven, here the true hidden manna. The study of the Word of God fits us for the work of God. The Bible is given that the man of God may be made perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. Christ asked that his disciples might be sanctified through the truth, affirming in that connection "thy Word is truth." As soldiers of God, part of our armor is to be the "sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." Ignorance of the Word of God accounts for the sickliness, feebleness, and the worthlessness of many church members. Ignorance of God's Word on the part of God's children is as lamentable as it is astounding. In order to Christian growth there must also be secret, family, and public prayer.

The First Step

on the road away from Christ is usually taken in departing from the closet. Family prayer is much neglected in these busy modern days. Constantine would have his statue representing him as kneeling in prayer. Only as men get down in lowliness before God can they go up in loftiness before men. The closet where the soul meets alone with God is the soul's banqueting-room. A prayerful spirit will always find a time and place for prayer. Isaac found his place in the open field, David in his bedchamber, Daniel by the window, and Peter on the house-top. Only as men have power with God can they have power over their fellowmen. Prayer lays hold of the hand of Omnipotence and brings heaven down to earth. Well might Mary Queen of Scotland say, "I fear the prayers of John Knox more than an army of ten thousand men." A praying church is the pulpit's strongest bulwark.

Growth in grace implies that we avoid secret sins. Jeremiah asks, "How long shall wicked thoughts harbor in thee?" We cannot always prevent the presence of evil thoughts, but we can help cherishing evil thoughts. We ought to know that if a man covets he steals; if he hates he murders. Secret defects in the Tay Bridge caused the terrific disaster when the thundering train reached the secretly weakened spans. No man is stronger than his weakest point, as no chain than its weakest link. No man can long play the hypocrite; what is in must come out. No man falls suddenly; he has long been leaning in the eye of God before he falls in the sight of men.

The Means of Grace.

If you would grow in grace do not neglect the services of God's house. Much depends on constant attendance. Even one unnecessary absence may result in great harm. Thomas lost much by being absent from the evening assembly on the day of the resurrection. A week of agony, a spirit of unbelief, and an unreasonable demand of evidence resulted from that absence. Too many Christians are neglecting the evening service of God's house. They are giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the American Sunday. The Sunday is violently attacked on the outside, and many Christians are practically attacking it on the inside. Their conduct is disloyal to their church, dishonoring to their Lord, and unpatriotic toward their country.

That we may grow in grace and knowledge there must be on the part of all Christians labor for the conversion of others. Such labor is the first impulse of a redeemed soul. It is only the liberal soul that shall be made fat; it is only he that watereth others who may claim the promise that he himself shall be watered. We need a quenchless zeal, a glowing enthusiasm, and a Christly love for the salvation of those about us. Oh, for the zeal of consecrated laymen like Harlan Page, Uncle John Vassar, Dwight L. Moody!

There must be unwavering trust in God if there is to be growth in grace. He is able to keep that which we have committed unto him; he will complete the work which he has begun. Only he who endures to the end shall be saved; only he who is faithful unto death shall receive the crown of life. Never backslide. Never play the coward. Never deny the Lord who has bought you. It is the remark of Bunyan that "they fall deepest into hell who fall backwards." It is a terrible thing to fall from church membership into an eternal hell. Beautiful is the story told of the brave Highland piper who was captured by Napoleon. He was told to play a march; he played it; to play an attack; he played it; to play a retreat, but the pipes gave forth no sound, he could only say, "I never learned that." Oh, soldiers for Christ, do your duty. Stand firm, march bravely, attack fearlessly, die if you must, but, like the immortal Old Guard, never, never surrender.

A WIDOW'S LIFE SAVED.

AN incident showing how sorely Africa needs Gospel influence is told in a letter to the The Baptist Missionary Magazine by Mr. J. H. Camp who writes from the mission steamer, Henry Reed, on the Congo. He says: This morning, just before starting from our last night's anchorage, a woman of about thirty or thirty-five years of age came to me and asked to be taken away from there, saying she was the wife of Chief Mdaumbi, a very powerful chief of the district. As Chief Mpoola on the opposite side of the river, had died, sixteen women were to be beheaded, and fifteen had already been beheaded; and as Mdaumbi was to share the deceased's property, he must send sacrifice, so he was going to send her to be beheaded as the sixteenth victim. She said that she had been hiding in the mission-houses and in the forest waiting for a steamer for over a month, and now wanted us to take her away from there, and she did not care where she went to. As these people will exaggerate in their own favor to such a great extent, I could scarcely believe that this could be, but thought her a criminal fearing punishment, so I told her to keep concealed until we returned, when I would see Mr. Scrivener in her behalf, and, if all was right, I would protect her. As I was busy on my journals and getting out of port, I saw nothing more of her until two hours later, when Charlie came up to plead her case, which she did very creditably, and we took her to Irebu. On returning, I saw Mr. Scrivener, and he said her story was quite true, and that I was quite justified in taking her away. So to-day she is a free, happy woman. I had her released from Mdaumbi by the state, and she will live in safety hereafter. Her name is Akouya.

Every Day Will I Bless Thee.

JESUS MY SAVIOUR.

THE sunshine of his tender love,
Illumes my darkened soul,
The Great Physician's healing touch,
Hath cleansed and made me whole.
He satisfies my longing heart
As nothing else would do,
I'm trusting now, in perfect peace,
This Friend, both tried and true.

My voice is tuned to sing his praise,
I cannot silent be;
This grateful, joyful song will last
Throughout eternity.
My Saviour, thou alone shalt have,
My praise, my life, my love;
I'll never cease to worship thee,
While here, or when above.

And now I feel that I must tell
My joy to all around;
I long to share with those I love
The peace which I have found.
This peace which fills my happy heart,
Is mine from day to day;
I love and trust my Saviour, Lord,
His peace doth last for aye.

THE HOUR OF TRIAL.

OH in the hour of trial,
Where tempests wild and dark,
Rise and with fury threaten
To overwhelm thy bark;
When over and around thee,
The thunderings are loud.
Yet hope on; yea, hope ever—
There's light beyond the cloud.

Oh, in the hour of trial,
When with a seven-fold heat,
The furnace of affliction
Seems kindled at thy feet;
Then trust, thy faith yet stronger
In him who heareth prayer.
And when through fire thou passest,
He will be with thee there.

Oh in the hour of trial,
When earth recedes from view,
Shrink not, nor dread the valley;
His love will light thee through.
And with those robed in whiteness,
By sorrows purified,
Give thee "abundant entrance,"
When thou art fully tried.

—MRS. V. A. BELDIN.

REFUGE.

O soul, sad and weary of all that has been!
Dost thou long to be free from the curse of thy sin? [then enter in?
God is love, peace and home—wilt thou

Oh soul, dost thy know what thy Father has done
To purchase thy peace, disobedient one?
He gave his beloved, compassionate Son.

My soul, own thy King. If allegiance thou yield,
Thou shalt know for thyself what his word has revealed,
That he is forever the buckler and shield.

Thy God is thy refuge—he says, "Come to me."
Yea, I come as a bird to her mountain doth flee;
Oh Christ, my Redeemer, I'm hiding in thee.

The tempter may smite me, but God is my aid;
In trouble my heart shall be never dismayed—
On the rock of his promise my soul shall be stayed. —CARRIE ELLIS BRECK.

QUESTIONS ANSWERED

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Thos. Parks, Newbern, Tenn. Who built the first altar?

The first altar mentioned in Scripture is that of either Cain or Abel, but it is fairly presumable that their parents had already learned to sacrifice and had so instructed their children.

T. W. Thomas, Baltimore, Md. I wish to get the "Oxford Helps" in a separate volume, but I would prefer the type to be a little larger than in the "Helps" bound in with your premium Bible.

These "Helps" are published in nonpareil type and the usual price is $1, but to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we send them at half that price. Not more than one copy will be sent to any reader at that figure, however.

C. A. P., Subscriber. 1. How long was the Chinese wall in building, and for what object was it built? 2. Among what nationalities is leprosy found?

1. Probably several generations. The wall was built by the first emperor of the Tsin dynasty about 220 B.C., as a protection against the Tartar tribes. 2. Leprosy is found in Asia, Africa, South America, and a few isolated localities of Europe, but prevails chiefly in China, Egypt, Syria, the West Indies and South Pacific.

Placentia Knowlton, Liberty, Me. When, where, and by whom was the first representative body held?

Sparta probably furnished the earliest known model, and there were no doubt experiments in representative government in still more ancient times; but the first authenticated representative bodies were the Anglo-Saxon "town-moots," at which freemen and cultivators of the land regulated the civil affairs of their own township or parish. The "burgh-moot," a higher body, administered municipal business, and the "hundred-moot," and "shire-moot," still higher bodies, exercised wider jurisdiction. In King Edgar's time, the "witenagemot" or first assembly or parliament, was established, with power to make laws and impose taxes and even to elect and depose the king.

A. Ross, Sailors' Snug Harbor, New Brighton, N. Y. Supposing a boy, fifteen years old, to be left alone in the world, with no near relatives and no friends especially interested in his fate. He has a common school education and $500 in the savings bank. He is ordinarily bright, but has no special or strong inclination to any calling. Mentally, morally or physically, he is an average American boy, with ambition enough to give him a good chance for success in life. What career will open the best opportunities for him?

There are thousands of boys in just such a dilemma, few of them, however, being quite so fortunate in regard to finances. Everybody is born with talents for some calling. The point is to determine the natural tendency, whether studious, argumentative, mechanical, or analytical. By diligent search, the pursuit for which he is best fitted will ultimately appear. Until the boy has developed sufficiently to make his own preferences clear, suggestions from others may do quite as much harm as good in leading him to a choice. A judicious friend would afford the boy increased opportunities for such voluntary observation as would be helpful to him, rather than endeavor to force a preference. When at last the preference is unmistakable, every endeavor should be made to qualify him for the line of work he will take up afterward, whether farming, physic, the ministry, a commercial or manufacturing life, or any of the mechanical or industrial trades. Don't force the boy; educate him meanwhile and establish him on the basis of a sound morality and religion; develop his better nature, as far as possible, and the problem of a life-calling will soon adjust itself.

THE FIRST SEAL.

The Concluding Events of this Dispensation as Portrayed under the Figure of the Seals.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE.*

JOHN'S view of the coming events, which would close this dispensation, was broken up into a series of pictures. Of these some were introduced by the opening,or breaking,of the seals which were upon the roll that Christ took from the hand of the Father (Rev. 5: 1-7). When the first seal is opened, the present world-power controlled and inspired by Satan's influence will receive the first impact of that stone which Daniel saw striking the image and then growing till it filled the whole earth. Let us see what significance there is for us in these events. As the curtain rises the first seal is opened, or broken amid thunderings.

The hour for action is come. Four mighty angels stand equipped; each with his distinct mission; and each waiting to obey. As soon as the seal is opened a voice is heard; a voice of thunder from within the throne. It is one of those four—the "Living Ones"—that speaks; not an address to John, but a command to one of these waiting angels, "Go!" And, at the word, "I, John, saw, and behold a white horse; and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given to him; and he went forth conquering and to conquer," vers. 1, 2. Who is this rider? In reply, I say, it is the Archangel Michael. We know that he is to be in command of the angels in the coming conflict with the Dragon (Rev. 12: 1-8), that the guiding of the work of the two witnesses and their defence is committed, to him the sealing of the one hundred and forty-four thousand of the tribes of Israel, Rev. 7: 2, 3 (comp. Ezek. 9: 2-4), and the protecting of the persecuted woman to the place provided for her refuge, 12: 6-14. We know, too, that a distinct revelation was made to Daniel that, at this exact crisis in the history of his people—at the commencing of the Parousia, when "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake . . . to everlasting life"—they shall not, in their final struggle with the Antichrist, be forsaken; but that "Michael shall stand up" for them, "that Great Prince which standeth up for the children of thy people," Dan. 12: 1-3. Here we find him stand, mounted, ready to the summons, waiting, expecting, and at once he rides forth on his mission; on that steed of heaven; its color white, bearing a righteous summons and a message of glad news, carrying no sword, shedding no blood. Yet strength is given him and the bow, and the promise of a continued success, "conquering and to conquer;" and the "crown" that assures him of final and happy victory.

This is the time of the recall and restoration of the Jews to Palestine; the rebuilding of their Temple; their last siftings and sufferings under the persecuting power of the Antichrist; the conversion and steadfast faith of many of them to their newly-found Messiah; and the final union of Judah and Israel in one kingdom and under one Head.

Many of the Jews will return to Palestine unchanged and unsanctified. They will find the Man of Sin in power, and they cleave to him. They enter into alliance with him (Dan. 9: 27). They accept his patronage. They receive power and lands from him: "Whosoever acknowledges him, he will make them to rule over many; and he will distribute the land as a reward" of their apostasy. Favored and protected by the power of that impious king, they settle, they build, they plant vineyards, they erect a temple; and for a time in false peace, they seem to prosper.

At the time of most urgent need,there come to Israel from the immediate Presence,endowed with mighty powers of miracle, and each with a mighty name, the two inspired and inspiring Witnesses; men who have been in that Upper Sanctuary, who have seen the Lord take that sealed Book from the Father's hand; and who descend to testify that the Messiah is there above, in the Shechinah, waiting to [illegible] to fulfil to them his promise as the Saviour. They speak for the Lord with tongues of fire; they testify what they have seen and know; and, for twelve hundred and sixty days, their voice is heard (Rev. 11: 3-7) calling many to repentance and to the fountain opened for their cleansing (Zech. 13: 1); organizing them in resistance of the Man of Sin; nerving them to face that Great Tribulation, in which Michael is to stand up for them (Dan. 12: 1) who are of the tribes of Israel (Rev. 7: 4-17).

SOUL-WINNING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing May 14. Prov. 11: 30; I. Cor. 9: 19-23.

WHAT is it to win a soul? The question needs to be asked in these days of Christian activity, of revival services and organized effort. As the man who is always in a hurry and perpetually in a state of excitement does less work than the quiet, methodical worker, so it is possible to miss the object of Christian Endeavor by aimless or mistaken though very energetic labor. It is important therefore to clearly understand what we are really trying to do when we set out to win a soul. If, as we are sometimes told, a soul is won when the declaration is made of belief in Christ, the task is very simple. That step is a matter for thankfulness, as it may be the beginning of the work; but it is a mistake to suppose that the soul is then won. The real work lies beyond all that. The man who knows there are a hundred cents to the dollar,and understands the rules of business procedure, is not necessarily an honest man. The convert,who simply understands the way of salvation, has still an experience to pass through before it can be said that his soul is won. When he earnestly seeks to be delivered from the power of his lower nature; when he loves righteousness and purity and is trying with every fibre of his being to become holy and godlike; when he deems the attainment of spiritual development the greatest and most desirable good that can be attained and is trusting in Christ as the way to that goal—then,and not till then, can the soul be said to be won. With past degradation retrieved, past sins forgiven, and new strength supplied, the process has commenced, which shall lead to possible developments beyond human conception. To win a soul to such a career is worth every effort; and he that winneth souls is wise.

The word "won" is an indication of method. The soul cannot be driven into the upward path. The wise man wins souls by the subtle power of his own life, as well as by direct effort. It is an attraction, an inspiration, an influence. Christ compared the influence to light. The soul to be won is living in dark places. It needs to be drawn out of its caverns to the mountain side and its gaze directed to the sun-gilded summits. It knows no delights save those it extracts from the earth at its feet, and it needs to be told of other and nobler occupations and of the way to reach them. Sympathy, self-effacement and enthusiasm are needed for success in this duty. Above all, the soul-winner must himself be won, and must know by experience the joy and happiness of the course to which he would win others.

THE Y. M. C. A. OF DAYTON, O.

The handsome and commodious building, a picture of which appears on this page is the home of the Young Men's Christian Association of Dayton, Ohio. It is centrally located on East Fourth Street and covers an area of sixty-six by a hundred and twenty feet. Its cost, including its site was eighty-two thousand dollars. It is thoroughly well equipped for its work in the busy and thriving city of nearly seventy thousand inhabitants. It has a large well-lighted gymnasium with all the modern appliances, a reading-room and a library of about a thousand volumes. The Association is the largest in the State although in seniority it ranks only sixth or seventh. It was not organized until 1870, but it has a membership 1,560, of which more than one half are on the active list. The religious meetings are well attended and nine brances of educational study are carried on with a large number of students.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN GEORGIA.

THE Christian Endeavor movement in Georgia is comparatively new, yet it has taken the same deep hold on the Christian young people there as it has in other States.

The Society that led in the work in Georgia is the Society connected with the Congregational Church of the Redeemer of Atlanta, Ga. This Society started the movement and the work has since gone steadily on. The Church of the Redeemer Society has always been a good live working Society and is especially noted in Atlanta for its work at the Grady Hospital. At this hospital every Sunday afternoon may be found a large delegation of the Society who go there to have a service of song, and after singing, the delegates go into the wards and quietly speak a kind word to the sick as they pass the row of cots, and only those who go there and see how the patients' faces brighten up when they see the delegates can know how the work is appreciated. Men who have never heard a Christian song in years,have their hearts so melted that they do not hesitate to ask the young people to sing some old hymn their mother used to sing years ago,when the now hardened man was a tender youth. This hospital work is a grand one, the Sunday afternoon song service is followed up by a call during the week and gladly are the young people received.

Other members of the Society are teachers at the mission school and do no end of good there as they lead or direct the young of the poor section of the city as to how they should live to become good useful Christians. This Society also assists the church by having a hand in paying the church expenses, and all last summer the Society took full charge of the Sunday evening service. The Society has a great helper in its pastor,the Rev. Dr. Sherrill, who is a great believer and assister of the Christian Endeavor young people. The present officers of this Society are: H. S. Lockwood, President; Miss Aline Jawt, Vice-Pres.; Edward Richmond, Treasurer; Miss Clarimon Kellam, Corresponding Secretary, and Miss Ida Richmond, Recording Secretary.

UNION MEETINGS IN THE WEST.

IT is gratifying to learn that some of the young people's societies in the West are finding inspiration and stimulus in union meetings. Our friend Mr. H. C. Leffingwell of Salida, Colo., reports that they were tried as an experiment and were found so helpful that it has been decided to hold them quarterly. Arrangements have been made to secure harmonious action and to make each society in turn the host of the others. One society selects the music for the meeting, another society chooses the leader and a third the subject. The time and place of meeting is decided by the general committee and notice is given from the various pulpits and in the local newspapers. There are a Christian Endeavor Society, an Epworth League and a Baptist Young People's Union in the town. As these societies are all working for a common object, they find no difficulty but rather mutual advantage from general consultation and friendly intercourse. As an evidence of the impartiality of the distribution of honors Mr. Leffingwell mentions that at one of the meetings which was held in the Methodist Church, there was a Baptist leader and the music was arranged by a Presbyterian Society. Subjects of common interest of a religious character are chosen and care is taken to avoid such as might be liable to provoke denominational controversy. It is evident that such meetings if continued with the discretion hitherto exercised must be beneficial to the young people of all the societies and occasions may arise in which much good may be accomplished by the utterance of a united voice on some question of social importance.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

THE Michigan League held its third annual Convention recently at Grand Rapids. The Convention was welcomed by Rev. A. M. Gould and a graceful response was made on behalf of the Leagues by Walter G. Sealey, Jr. An able address was delivered by Dr. Potts who expressed his belief that the Epworth League was one of the mightiest and most efficient means of character building which this age had produced. Dr. Berry, editor of the Epworth Herald, also took part in the proceedings dwelling on the various relations of the League to other Societies and to social life. Rev. F. L. Thompson spoke on the subject of Spiritual Work and Dr. L. W. Bliss of Saginaw on the Mercy and Help Department. Other papers were: "Our Attitude to Sunday Resorts," presented by Mr. George G. Whitworth, and "How to use the Public Press," by Mr. W. G. Bolles.—The Cleveland Ohio District held its Convention at Lorain, O. It was very largely attended and continued in session two whole days. The Convention re-elected the entire cabinet, G. L. Doty, President; Harry B. Daugherty, Secretary; John E. Heene, Treasurer.—A Chapter which was organized a little over a year ago at Cawnpore, India, has taken the name of the Layton Chapter in grateful remembrance of Miss Layton its president who died recently. It has also raised an appropriate memorial to her in subscribing about $500 with which to provide a free education for one native girl in the High School of the town.—The League has now a Chapter in the City of Mexico. Rev. P. F. Valderrama was active in organizing it and takes a deep interest in its progress. Its department of Literary Work is particularly active. It meets every Friday evening and is reported to be in a very flourishing condition. The Chapter holds its weekly prayer-meeting at nine o'clock on Sunday mornings.

The Family and Home Circle

A Great Naval Pageant.

The Leading Nations of the World Represented in the Brilliant Review in New York Harbor—A Splendid Spectacle.

COLUMBUS was honored not only by Columbia's sons and daughters but by the civilized nations of the world, on April 27. During the last few weeks, the navies of England, Germany, France, Spain, Italy, Russia and Holland, have been represented in American waters by a large number of magnificent warships, the whole forming the finest and most formidable aggregation of naval strength ever seen in the west Atlantic. The purpose of their coming was to participate in the great international naval review at New York, commemorative of the discovery of America. Hampton Roads was the rendezvous of the united fleets, and for many days prior to the great review in New York Bay, the offing opposite Fortress Monroe presented a brilliant and imposing sight. It was literally crowded with those tremendous floating batteries of death, as many as forty warships being in line, riding peacefully at anchor, while visits were exchanged and courtesies extended by the officers of the different squadrons and boatloads of guests from Fortress Monroe were welcomed and entertained aboard the vessels, they returning the courtesy by a series of receptions on shore. It was a season of such international amity as is seldom seen, and a pleasant thing it was to witness the good-will and fellowship of old-time foes.

On the 24th, the fleets left Hampton Roads for New York, arriving on the 26th and on the morning of the following day, they were marshalled in line in the bay for a parade of such splendor and dimensions as surprised and delighted the hundreds of thousands of spectators, who crowded the pleasure boats and steamers for viewing the spectacle from some convenient point on shore. There were about two score warships, including a number from our own "White Squadron," under the command of Rear-Admiral Gherardi. These were the San Francisco, Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Vesuvius, Yorktown, Newark, Miantonomoh, Bennington, Atlanta, Bancroft, Charleston, and Concord, the dispatch boat Dolphin, and the saucy little torpedo boat Cushing. All are among the finest representatives of the new American navy. England sent the armored cruiser Blake (one of the most powerful warships afloat), the Magicienne, the Tartar and the Australia, all under command of Vice-Admiral J. O. Hopkins. The Blake was probably the swiftest and most powerful vessel that participated in the review. France was represented by a fleet of three ships under Admiral Libran, the Jean Bart, a magnificent cruiser and a most formidable engine of destruction, being the largest. Her companions were the wooden cruiser Arethuse, and the comparatively small warship Hussard. Emperor William of Germany sent two of the finest representatives of his new navy—the Kaiserin Augusta and the Seeadler (Sea Eagle), under Commander Buschel, Imperial Navy. Both are splendid vessels of powerful armament and the transatlantic trip was their maiden voyage. Russia was imposingly represented by the warships General Admiral, Rynda, and Dimitri Donskoi. Italy sent the protected cruiser Etna, carrying the biggest guns of any of the foreign fleet, the protected cruiser Dogali and the iron-clad Giovanni Bausan, with Admiral Magaghni in command of the fleet. Spain contributed the crack cruisers Reina Regenta and Infanta Isabel and the gunboat Nueva Espana, and also the "Columbus fleet," consisting of the three caravels, Santa Maria, Pinta and Nina, built on the exact model of the ships of Columbus. They have already been described in these columns. The Spanish Commander was Rear Admiral Ignacio Gomez. Brazil sent the powerful ironclad Aquidaban and two small cruisers, the Republica and Triandentes. Holland was represented by the large iron-and-steel cruiser Van Speijk, Argentina, by the cruiser Nueve de Julio, and Portugal by the corvette Alfonsa Albuquerque.

During the entire week of the review the metropolis was in gala dress. On Wednesday the warships moved up to an anchorage at the mouth of the Hudson River, preceded by the three caravels, the whole naval line extending from 34th Street to 102d Street. The President and Cabinet, Supreme Court Judges, and high Federal officials arrived from Washington that afternoon, and on the forenoon of Thursday reviewed the fleet; President Cleveland being on the U. S. dispatch boat, Dolphin. The route of the naval parade was from the lower to the upper bay. Foreign vessels held the port line, while the starboard column, consisted of American warships with Admiral Gherardi's flagship, the Philadelphia, at the head. The double column extended from 32d Street to 88th Street, the turning point being opposite 96th Street, North River. Every ship was gayly dressed and with bands playing, and banners and ensigns flying, they swept proudly up that river which Verrazzani explored thirty-two years after Columbus' discovery, and to which Hendrik Hudson, nearly a century later, gave his name. Hundreds of cannon roared in deafening salutes, as the warships passed the Dolphin, with the Presidential party on board. After the review, the commanding officers of the various ships were entertained at a banquet on the Dolphin. On the next day, a military land parade took place, in which the foreign crews and marines were invited to participate. The parade was reviewed by the President at Union Square and was witnessed by probably a million spectators.

COMMANDERS IN THE GREAT COLUMBIAN NAVAL REVIEW, NEW YORK.

1. Rear-Admiral Bancroft Gherardi, U. S. N. 2. Admiral Sir John Hopkins, Great Britain. 3. Grand Duke Alexander Meheilovitch, of Russian Flagship, Dimitri Donskoi. 4. Captain Victor Concon of the Santa Maria.

Little White Angels.

THERE was a child born in your house. All your friends congratulated you. The other children of the family and of the neighborhood stood amazed looking at the new-comer, and asked a great many questions, genealogical and chronological. You said—and you said truthfully—that a white angel flew through the room and left the little one there. That little one stood with its two feet in the very centre of your sanctuary of affection, and with its two hands it took hold of the altar of your soul. But one day there came one of the three scourges of children—scarlet fever, or croup, or diphtheria—and all that bright scene vanished. The chattering, the strange questions, the pulling at the dresses as you crossed the floor—all ceased. As the great friend of children stooped down and leaned toward that cradle, and took the little one in his arms, and walked away with it into the bower of eternal summer, your eye began to follow him, and you followed the treasure he carried, and you have been following them ever since; and, instead of thinking of heaven only once a week, as formerly, you are thinking of it all the time, and you are more pure and tender-hearted than you used to be, and you are patiently waiting for the day-break. It is not self-righteousness in you to acknowledge that you are a better man than you used to be—you are a better woman than you used to be. What was it that brought you the sanctifying blessing? O! it was the dark shadow on the short grave; it was the dark shadow on your broken heart; it was the brooding of a great black trouble; it was a raven—it was a raven. Dear Lord, teach us that white providences do not always mean advancement, and that black providences do not always mean retrogression.

Guard Well Your Boys.

"You can't keep boys quite straight, you know. They must have a chance to sow their wild oats." Must? A word from Satan's vocabulary! Look ahead a few years. There he goes—young boy! swearing, swaggering, course, obscene! You hope he will marry and sober down? Yes, if some pure girl will pour the fulness of her sweet-life into the turbid stream of his, there is a bare chance that he may be saved. How much better to have trained him to the right when you had him under your hands! In the outset he was not unlike his sister in morals. You hold her to the proprieties and decencies, while you let him run at his own will in paths of misdeed. Now, in purity of life, they are leagues apart. There are as many boys as there are girls in the infant classes of our Sunday Schools; but one-half as many boys as girls in the Bible classes. Women outnumber men in the church two to one. In the State prison men, outnumber women fifty to one. This sad proportion tells its own story!

A DESCENDANT OF COLUMBUS.

ONE of the features of the Columbian year is the presence in this country of the

THE DUKE OF VERAGUA.

Duke of Veragua, a Spanish nobleman who comes to us with a peculiar claim upon the kindly courtesies of the people of America. The Duke is a peer of Spain in his own right and a direct lineal descendant of the great explorer, in the eleventh generation. He has come, with his wife, son, daughter and brother, to attend the World's Fair and he has succeeded in making a most favorable impression, not only in New York City but in every other city thus far visited. He is a man of high culture and accomplishments, and since his arrival various municipalities have vied with each other in doing him honor as their guest. He was presented with the freedom of the City of New York, and has been entertained in different cities as a national guest whose distinguished descent and eminent personal qualities entitled him to the warmest courtesies of the American people. He will remain in this country for some time as the guest of the nation and will be present at the opening ceremonies of the World's Fair. Commander Dickins of the American Navy has been acting as the official escort and companion of the Duke since his arrival. There is something refreshingly republican about these descendants of the old Spanish nobility, and the Duke, the Duchess and their family seem to have happily adapted themselves to the spirit and manner of our people more than any other visitors of distinction in recent years.

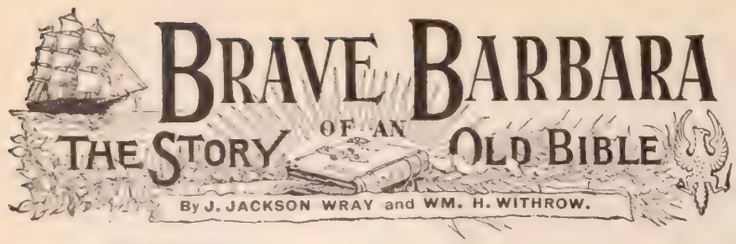
Politeness Doesn't Hurt.

"DON'T be afraid of politeness,—it will not hurt you," says a reverend writer. "Have none of that false shame which crushes the life from so many of you good and noble impulses, and causes you to shrink from performing little acts of tenderness and love toward one another. Let your feet, your hands, your voice be the willing servants of that great master of politeness, the heart. Politeness teaches how to obey, gladly, fearlessly, and openly. The truly polite child is a good son, a good daughter, for politeness teaches him the duty and respect he owes to his parents; he is a kind and grateful brother; his very willingness to help his sister makes her feel better and stronger. He is a true friend, for he scorns the unkind works that wound those who love him. Politeness and charity are twins—they make the true gentleman, the true gentlewoman, helpful, loving, unpretentious. The world would be better if the young boys and young girls, would obey the watchword of true politeness, which is charity."



CHAPTER VIII.

A GALLANT RESCUE.

"TOWARD sunset," writes a chronicler of these days, "our voyagers caught a glimpse of the beautiful South-bay, a narrow inlet to Lake Champlain, glowing in the light of the falling day like the sea of glass mingled with fire. They landed for the night on the carpeted borders of a dense forest, now occupied by the busy town of Whitehall. A rude tent was erected among the trees for the women and children, and a simple booth of branches for the men.

The camp fire was built, and soon the red blaze of the burning pine-knots vied with the crimson glory of the setting sun. A portion of dried meat sent forth its savory odor, and wheaten cakes were baked on the hot griddle. The children, amid shouts of glee, gathered wild raspberries in the woods. A little carefully-hoarded tea—a great luxury at that time—was steeped, and, that nothing might be lost, the leaves were afterwards eaten with the bread. A hearty, happy meal was made; a hymn was sung that made the glades of the virgin forest ring with the name of Jesus and of the Great Father, in whose care the singers felt themselves to be; again Barbara's Bible did gracious duty; and then the trustful and tired travelers slept behind the curtains of the night.

On the second day, the bateaux stretched out into the pleasant bay, and, wafted by the soft south wind, skirted the wooded shores. Day after day, the rude barges with their patient, hopeful voyagers, impelled by oar and sail, glided on the broad and beautiful bosom of Lake Champlain, a perfect paradise of peace. At that time its gently sloping and emerald shores were an almost unbroken wilderness, with here and there the solitary clearing of an adventurous pioneer.

All went well with our adventurous exiles till the afternoon of the third day. And then a strange thing happened. While they were sailing on the widest part of Lake Champlain, wearily and painfully rowing in a dead calm, a sudden tempest rose which threatened them with desperate peril. The day had been hot and sultry; not a breath of air ruffled the still surface of the water. The burning sunlight had been reflected like an oven from the steely surface of the lake. The children drooping like parched flowers, were fretful and restless with the distressing heat; and the oarsmen wearily gasped beneath their toil. Presently a grateful coolness began to steal through the oppressive air; a gentle breeze came to them like the benediction of God, and a spreading cloud veiled from them the face of the scorching sun. While yet our grateful voyagers were congratulating themselves on this most welcome and delightful change, the elders seeing therein the generous act of God, the younger laughing gleefully at this pleasant turn of fortune, another surprise appeared, and cheerful talk and ripple of laughter were silenced by what they saw and heard.

Paul Heck, who had been leisurely scanning the horizon, sitting with bare locks to catch the invigorating breeze, and drinking in, after his own quiet fashion, the glorious beauty of the lake and its surroundings, sprang up with a start and a look of wonder and of fear. "Down with your sail!" he shouted to his co-voyagers, who were some distance off in the other boat, pointing at the same time to the red sky-line in the far west. With eager haste he and Lawrence set to work to take in and close-reef their own sails. To an unobservant eye, there was little sign of danger, blue sky, still seas, and quiet breezes seldom are, but Paul had seen a long white line of foam on which a dim, dark smoke or cloud was hovering, and both advancing with more than race-horse speed along the smiling lake.

"John!" said the thoroughly aroused Paul to his stout henchman, Lawrence, "Take the helm from Mary, keep her well before the squall! It will be on us and over us in five minutes!"

The words were barely out of his lips; not five minutes and scarcely fifty seconds had passed, when the bateaux were suddenly surrounded by foaming billows which tumbled and tossed them about as though they had been cockle-shells instead of lumbering barges, heavily laden. The air with ominous rapidly became thick and dark, lighted up as suddenly with broad flames of electricity which only made the subsequent dark more gloomy still; and this, again, was pierced with those terrible zig-zag lines and lances of forked lightning which too often have death upon their perilous point.

Eager to care for his beloved ones, Paul Heck sought to cross the barge to fling some covering over Barbara and the children. A sudden gust of wind, a sudden heaving of the boat, and our solid and silent Paul was tilted into the subsiding waters of the angry lake. A shriek from the white lips of Mary Embury, and the horrified cry of the boys as they saw the sad catastrophe, was followed on the instant by a leap from the strong limbs of Lucky Mike, who had seen the accident, and who, in the same moment had followed his beloved and honored master into the deep.

Then was it indeed a thing to thank God for that Michael Finnigan had been familiar from his childhood with the power to swim, and to "swim like a duck," as he was proud to boast, though he had never known the full value of the accomplishment as now. Surely the movements of the brave young Irishman were directed at the moment by the Master Mind, for he plunged into the water in the near neighborhood of the unfortunate Paul, kept him in sight, reached him and upheld him until Lawrence lifted him into the boat.

And so it came to pass that Paul Heck was saved amid the mingled prayers and praises of the little crew; and the looks that greet Lucky Mike, the pats and strokes of the caressing children, as if he were a big Newfoundland dog, as he stood dripping, but safe and sound were never forgotten by the poor waif of Munster, until his dying day. But the prize and crown of his reward came to him when "Misthress Barbara" beckoned him to her side, wiped the water from his face, smoothed with her motherly hand his tangled hair, and imprinting a kiss on his cheek, said with the tears swimming in her eyes, "Thank you, thank you, dear friend. It was a happy day for me, that day in the farm at Ballygarane, when I began to make friends with 'Onlucky Mike.' God bless the lad!"

If ever there was a happy mortal in existence, it was Lucky Mike Finnigan on that ever-to-be-remembered day! After a while, even the remnant of that strange storm and hurricane was past, the two bateaux got under the lee of the "Isle-aux-Noix," and our immigrants disembarked thereon in a sheltered and inviting bay. Their limbs, at least those of the woman and children, were cramped and stiffened by long crouching in their water-soaked clothing, and the men were stiff and weary with their sore battle with the storm; but, nevertheless, the great deliverance, the marvellous rescue from the tempest, and that of Paul Heck from the deeps of Lake Champlain filled their souls with gratitude, their hearts with hope and cheer, and their lips with song.

A bright fire was soon blazing on the grass; their wet clothes were soon dried, thanks to the big fire, the pleasant breeze and the warm sunshine which filled the air. A most acceptable meal was prepared, pleasantly discussed, and their sorrows were "like the waters that pass away." Towards evening the stormy lake sobbed itself to rest. The sun set in a serene sky, and the moon, riding the heavens with scarce a cloud to fleck them, flooded the fair landscape of lake and bay and wood and glade with a silvery beauty, amid which they rested and slept in peace.

In the island on which the little party had found acceptable shelter they found a small log block-house, the lone "outpost" of the British force in that region. This little party of red-jackets were the sole defenders of this gate-way of Canada, and received them graciously and treated them kindly as loyal subjects of King George. Here again Lucky Mike was able to do his friends a good turn, for the Corporal in charge of the outpost was not only an Irishman, but a close relation of the "Clan Finnigan," and insisted that our young Irish favorite came of the same "ould stock as himself."

"It's a thrue saying," quoth the corporal "that blood is thicker than wather; an' sure a Finnigan must stand by a Finnigan so long as smoke rises or wather runs, an' niver a wan o' them would grudge the tap av a shillaly or a noggin o' comfort when a Finnigan cries 'Ochone.'"

This colonel kindly guided them to the entrance of the Richelieu River, on which they proposed to enter the river St. Lawrence, and so reach the goal of their desire, the city of Montreal. Thus they were soon on the water way once again, and the distresses of yesterday were soon forgotten in the sunshine and the hope that made for them a glad to-day.

Their next halt was at the little hamlet of Sorel, where they received kindly welcome, certain needful additions to their failing supplies, and were able to give the poor solitary groups of soldiers who held the fort high compensation, by holding a warm and hearty Methodist service in the mess-room.

It was attended by the whole of the soldiers except the two on guard; and the Scottish lieutenant in command, himself of religious bent and bias, undertook the ordering of the all too rare piece of good fortune that broke the monotony of their dreamy lives. John Lawrence won the hearts of his rough and curious hearers by his talk about the Prodigal son, and the Father's open arms; Brave Barbara evoked thunderous plaudits by the singing of spiritual songs. This was foreign to her notions of what should be permitted in a religious service. So she determined to change the character of her song; and as she sung with intensest pathos the immortal hymn, "Jesus, lover of my soul," there came no plaudits, but heads were bent low, and eyes unused to weep were filled with tears.

Then again she sang the stanza, "Thou, O Christ, art all I want," and with such pathos and such power that its effect upon herself was to bring her down upon her knees, to plead, with inspired lips, and eyes streaming with tears, that Christ would come there and then. Down knelt the whole band of rude and reckless soldiery, and in a little time a true "revival meeting" woke the echoes of the warlike walls, and John Nelson himself, or George Whitefield "never had a grander time," to quote the latter's favorite expression when the "power of the Lord was present to heal."

The seed sown in the little frowning fortress on the banks of the St. Lawrence, resulted in an enduring harvest, and in after years, both Lieut. Campbell and certain of his comrades came to be fellow disciples with Brave Barbara and her companions in their subsequent home elsewhere.

Embarking anew on the broad bosom of the St. Lawrence, our travelers urged their cumbrous barges on their way to Montreal. Through all the weary and heroic struggle, which tested the strength and endurance of voyagers to the utmost, they were cheered by the brave woman whose insiring songs of Zion filled their hearts with courage.

At last, with glad and grateful hearts the spent and weary voyagers beheld the forest-crowned heights, the grassy ramparts, and the long stone wall that told them they had reached the long-sought and eagerly-welcomed city of Montreal! A red-coated sentry paced up and down the rude landing-stage, and another mounted guard beside the ponderous wooden gate, studded with iron bolts and clamped with iron bars, like the portcullis of some mid-ieval continental town of the Old World.

Paul Heck, Brave Barbara and John Lawrence set out to find temporary lodgings, leaving the rest "to keep the gear and bide by the stuff" until their return. Our pioneer pilgrims entered by what is called the "water-gate" and turned to the long low line of barracks. Their first reception was most disheartening, and, had it not been for Brave Barbara's strength of will and her cool, calm courage, might well have damped their ardor and beaten them back from their enterprise. In reply to Paul Heck's civil inquiry of an idle soldier as to whether there were any "Methodists" in the garrison—for already the close brotherhood of the Methodist bond was asserting itself—the soldier answered and with a laugh: "Methodies! What's them, I should like to know? Never heeard o' no Methodies, I didn't."

Paul explained, more fully, that they were the followers of John Wesley, but that failed to throw any more light on the subject in that quarter.

"John Wesley! Who's he?" was the reply. I niver heeard on him. Zay, Ned, do'ee knaw aught o' Methodies 'i the barracks?"

This was addressed to a comrade.

"Methodists!" said he. "O ay; he means them rantin' Swaddlers wot was in the King's Own in Flanders: don't ye mind? The strait-laced hypocrites! A honest soldier couldn't drain a jack, or win a main at cards, or kiss a lass, or curse a Johnny Crapaud, but they'd drop down on him. No, there bean't noan on 'em here, an' wot's more, we don't want none on 'em nayther."

"Ah, well, we're all Methodists," said Barbara, who was never ashamed of her colors.

"You are!" said Ned, dropping both belt and pipeclay. "Well, you're a plucky 'un, I must say. But there, you're like all the rest of 'em. Still," he continued with a look of respectful wonder, "I shouldn't ha ta'en you for one o' that sort."

"Will you be good enough to take us to the captain?" said Barbara, in such a way that Ned lifted his hand to his cap by way of an instinctive salute.

"Here, Geoffrey," replied the soldier, calling to an orderly close by who was grooming an officer's horse, and suspended operations to listen, "take the parson and, and—this lady to the captain, will you."

"Take 'em yourself," said the irate Geoffrey, who evidently had a good deal of the ultra-democratic leaven in him. "I bean't none o' your sarvant."

The little altercation was suddenly interrupted by the interference of "Authority" itself. A commanding officer appeared; and as he came clattering down the stone steps to the tune of jingling spurs and trailing sword, those "under authority" subsided into submissive silence.

"Hallo!" said the new-comer. "What's the row with you fellows now? Beg your pardon, madame," he continued, catching sight of our little group of voyagers, and involuntarily lifting his cocked hat, as he addressed Barbara Heck, "Can I be of any service to you?"

"We have just arrived from the province of New York," said Barbara, and as she spoke she made an elaborate and old-fashioned courtesy to the gentleman in epaulettes and gold lace.

"From New York, have you?" said the officer, who pricked up his ears in legitimate curiosity at the words, for there had come to be but little intercourse between the new province and the Colonies in those quarrelsome days. "I must ask you to follow me into the Council-room: and, fortunately, the governor is at home."

The officer led the way, followed by our somewhat awe-stricken pilgrims, along the narrow Rue Notre Dame, to a long low rather insignificant-looking building, with quaint dormer windows and a high-pitched roof. A lofty flag-staff was fixed on the open space in front, and from this floated the red-cross flag of St. George.

For some time Barbara and her companions were kept waiting in an ante-room, and our peaceful Paul was not much at his ease in these new surroundings. It certainly did encourage him to catch a peep every now and then at the old familiar flag rippling and rustling in the breeze; but the two sentries in their red-jackets with their fixed bayonets, pacing to and fro beneath the window, was a sight not at all to his heart's content. In due time the captain returned, and conducted them into a long, low apartment, with a flat, wooden ceiling.

Seated at a large, green-covered table, on which lay his sword, and a number of charts and papers, pay-rolls, dockets, and the like, was an officer of commanding presence and noble mien. His somewhat towsled mass of grizzled hair, the side-whiskers and bushy eyebrows of iron-grey, the tanned and weather-bound features, and a certain alertness in the gleam and use of his piercing black eyes, suggested the thought that he had "seen service." By his side sat a much younger man, busily writing. This was his secretary, who seemed to be engrossed with important business, and scarcely looked at the new-comers who were standing within the door, silently waiting the Governor's attention.

"Oh, ah," said he suddenly looking up, as if he had forgotten all about them: which was, doubtless, true, for in those exciting days the Governor of Montreal had something more important than the fortunes of a few emigrants to think about. "Excuse me: pray be seated. Pierre, bring a chair for the lady;" and so while honest Paul and his friend, John Lawrence, were sufficiently well provided for by the stiff-backed benches provided for the common herd, Barbara was insensibly and naturally regarded as worthy of special courtesy.

"I hear," said Colonel Burton, turning specially to Paul Heck, and speaking with some little sternness, "that you have come from the disloyal province of New York."

"Ye—yes, your worship," said Paul, nervously fumbling with his hat, and wishing his honest self fully fifty miles away.

CHRISTIAN LAND-OWNERS *

THERE is not a word in the positive precepts of our Lord Jesus Christ or of any of the New Testament writers ordaining the existence of communism. The attitude of our Lord Jesus Christ on this subject is worthy of remark. He raised no contention with the old order of things. He announced no principle that by necessary and logical inference would overthrow that order. He mingled continually with those who possessed landed property, and although he was free to denounce oppressors of the poor and despoilers of the widow, no word fell from his lips censuring owners of land.

It would seem from the Gospels that among his closest friends and sincerest disciples were those who occupied homes of their own. He accepted the hospitality of these and other householders with the utmost freedom, and with never a suggestion of disfavor or rebuke. His favorite retreat when at Jerusalem was the beautiful home of Lazarus and his sisters Martha and Mary on Mount Olivet. To this delightful suburban retreat he continually and lovingly resorted after the wearying toils and vexing contentions of a day's teaching in the Holy City. Can we suppose that these beloved Bethany friends were guilty of wrong or impropriety in their ownership of their Bethany home, and that our blessed Lord received therein from them the sweets and solace of hospitality without a word or seemingly a thought of protest or rebuke? We cannot think it.

Among the apostles of Jesus was John, a friend of the High Priest, who owned "his own house." The original expression need not imply that John had a house in Jerusalem, but certainly does show that his usual habitation was fixed, and was his own. When the Master hung upon the Cross in the agonies of dissolution it was to the disciple, the beloved John, that he committed the care of his mother. It would almost appear that the fact of John's ownership of a home in which that venerated mother might fittingly be sheltered, was the one which decided the choice and action of Jesus in committing the Virgin Mary to this disciple's care. It is true indeed that this evidence concerning our Lord's attitude towards the question of personal ownership of land is largely of a negative character; and yet there are circumstances under which such testimony has all the weight of the most positive witnessing. At all events, it is clearly manifest that the teaching and example of Jesus Christ cannot be quoted against the right of individual ownership of land.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON
QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION
MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—IN COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. Its perfectly pure, free from all impurities and so simple any one can use it. It acts quickly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERCEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

—Recommended by all who have tested its merits—Used by people of refinement.—

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. THE CHINESE BAN.

HOW much the profession of faith in Christ costs in China may be inferred from the following proclamation which has been issued in the Province of Honan "Should any one become bewitched by the foreign doctrines and not be willing to sacrifice either to Confucius or to the spirits of his ancestors, he must be severely dealt with by his clan. His name must be erased from the family register and his whole family driven from the Province." In face of these threats several men from the Province have recently become Christians. When it was known that one of these was baptized, his friends were furious. He was dragged out to the ancestral temple, where he was beaten; he was not allowed to say anything in his defence, but was made to renounce forever all clan rights and privileges. To be an outcast from one's friends and home, rather than give up one's belief, would be anywhere a severe test of sincerity, especially so in China, where so much is made of family festivals and where so much property, such as wells, ground, animals and agricultural implements are held in common.

Irrigation

is of immense importance to you, whoever you are, wherever you are, if you choose to profit by it.

Better than rain; the sun and air and soil combine to make it better than rain; the farmer gets it when and where he wants it—this part dry and that part wet.

Irrigation costs as much for grain as for fruit; but the southern fruits pay best. Skip grain and grow fruit; or invest in irrigation for oranges lemons prunes figs grapes almonds etc in Southern California.

A $50 share of our stock costs $50 now; it will be worth $500, if all goes well, in three years—perhaps before the first dividend.

Pamphlet free; and map goes with it.

Extract from a Sermon by

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

of Brooklyn, N. Y.

If you are too poor to support your family and pay for a policy on your life, you are too poor to take chance of dying and leaving them deprived of the support your brain and hands supply them.

Says some man, "I believe what you say; it is right and Christian, and I mean sometime to attend to this matter." My friend, you are going to lose the comfort of your household in the same way the sinner loses heaven—by procrastination. I see all around me the destitute and suffering families of parents who meant some day to attend to this Christian duty.

Oh! man, before forty-eight hours have passed away, appear at the desk of some one of our great life insurance companies, have the stethoscope of the physician put to your heart and lungs, and by the seal of some honest company, decree that your children shall not be subject to the humiliation of financial struggle in the dark days of your demise.

Life insurance is the only way ever devised to make now a liberal provision for the future with a small amount of money.

The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York.

A FILIAL BURGLAR.

IN illustrating the power of magnanimity to overcome the rebellious heart Mr. Hamilton tells the following incident:

"A young man, the son of wealthy and godly parents, was by evil companions drawn away from the Christian associations of his boyhood and youth, and enticed by the false glitter of worldly pleasure into the vortex of drink and dissipation. His father kept him liberally supplied with pocket money, but his money melted like snow, and again and again demands were made upon his father, until he at last stopped the supplies. Then the young man, unable to procure money by any means, formed the plan of breaking into his father's house. He knew where the money and valuables were kept, and flattered himself that he would make a good haul. He watched his opportunity, and gained an entrance at a time convenient for his purpose; and getting into the room where the money and valuable documents were kept, he proceeded to ransack the place. Tied in a bundle with other important papers he found his father's will, and impelled by curiosity, read it. Yes, there his name was, and opposite it a legacy for a very large sum. The son was struck with remorse, tears ran down his cheeks, and kneeling there among the booty he had meant to take away with him, he asked God to forgive him his sins and to reconcile him to so loving a father; and God heard. From that night that young man began a new and upward life, and was received with open arms by his father."
